By Lieut. Commander A. P. Fairfield, U. S. Navy, Secretary-Treasurer of the Navy Athletic Association

Football at the Naval Academy dates back to the early '80s, and, as some one has said, the Navy therefore belongs to that football aristocracy which played the game prior to 1890. The records of the older games are incomplete, but the first definite account found in the periodicals of the day recited the story of a game with Johns Hopkins in 1883. The score was 2-0 in favor of the Baltimore institution, but the feature of the game was a goal kicked from the 50-yard line by Dashiell of the Navy, (brother of Prof. Paul J. Dashiell.) The goal was not allowed, "because some careless cadet was standing in front of the ball." Hopkins, St. John's of Annapolis, Lehigh, Pennsylvania, and Princeton were the principal teams played during the '80s.

Beginning with 1890, the Army, Carlisle, Rutgers, Dickinson, Virginia, Georgetown, Franklin and Marshall, Bucknell, and Lafayette also appeared on the schedule at various times. The Army was, of course, the natural rival. The first Army-Navy game was played in 1890, and resulted in a Navy victory. Three more games followed, the Army winning once (1891) out of the four times. These games were played on the home grounds, alternating between West Point and Annapolis. The series was then broken off, and for five years following 1893 there was no game.

In '99 football relations were resumed, and the game played at the nearest half-way point, Philadelphia. The Army won that year, but the Navy came back in 1900 and hung up another gilded football in the gymnasium. It was the Navy's last taste of victory for four successive years. In 1905 the only tie game of the seventeen played between the two institutions was staged at Princeton. In 1909 there was no game, but the series was resumed in 1910. The Navy has won the three games played beginning with that year. The series now stands as follows: Navy has won nine times. Army has won seven times. There was one tie.

Two peculiar features have distinguished the series. One side or the other has always scored; there has been no score of 0-0. The last touchdown scored was in 1908.

The game this year in New York will be in the nature of an experiment so far as location is concerned. The seating capacity of the field is greater than at Philadelphia, but it makes a long trip for the brigade of midshipmen, who have to go and come in one day. It means traveling sixteen hours out of the twenty-four.

Of the 218 games which teams from Annapolis have played, Navy has won 141, lost 57, and tied 20. Exclusive of ties this figures 74 per cent. won.

YALE---HARVARD---U. OF P.---CORNELL

BRICKLEY, HARVARD'S CRACK KICKER

It has often happened that Brickley's field goals obviated any necessity of the Crimson team's making a touchdown. That was the case in this year's game against Princeton. After Storer had blocked a Tiger punt, Brickley sent the ball neatly between Princeton's goal posts, and the score was 3—0.

Blue and Crimson Captains who led teams in yesterday's game at Cambridge, and the two opposing chiefs in next Thursday's Cornell-Pennsylvania match.

CAPT. STORER, HARVARD

Before the Crimson players had won from Princeton by a score of 3—0 a fortnight ago, they had defeated the University of Maine 30—4, Bates 14—0, Williams 23—3, Holy Cross 47—7, Pennsylvania State 29—0, and Cornell 23—6. A week ago Harvard beat Brown 37—0, and closed the season with yesterday's game at Cambridge.

CAPT. YOUNG, PENNSYLVANIA

Cornell and the University of Pennsylvania, whose teams will meet next Thursday, have been bitter football rivals since 1893, but Cornell has won only once, and there has been only one tie game. Pennsylvania has triumphed in 18 games, and has scored 369 points to Cornell's 59. Pennsylvania has had an interesting series with the Carlisle Indians, having won 11, lost 6, and tied 2 of the 19 games played since 1895. This season Pennsylvania has defeated Gettysburg College 53—0, Lafayette 10—0, Swarthmore 20—0, and Brown 28—0, tied Carlisle 7—7, defeated Penn State 17—0, and lost to Dartmouth 21—34. She played Michigan a week ago, 0—37.

CAPT. KETCHAM, YALE

Yale and Harvard have been gridiron rivals since 1875. In their contests previous to yesterday's game Yale was the victor 23 times, Harvard 6 times, and there were 5 tie games. Since the modern method of scoring numerically came into use in 1883, Yale had made a total of 276 points to Harvard's 93. Their battles for the last ten years have resulted as follows:

1903	Yale	16	Harvard	0	1908	Harvard	4	Yale 0
1904	Yale	12	Harvard	0	1909	Yale	8	Harvard 0
1905	Yale	6	Harvard	0	1010	Yale	0	Harvard 0
1907	Yale	12	Harvard	0	1912	Harvard	20	Yale 0

During the season Yale has defeated Holy Cross 19—0, tied the University of Maine 0—0, defeated Lafayette 27—0, Lehigh 37—0, and Washington and Jefferson 6—0; has been beaten by Colgate, 6—16, and won from Brown 17—0. The Princeton game a week ago was a tie, 3—3.

CAPT. J. J. MUNNS, CORNELL

Cornell has beaten Michigan 8 out of the 11 games played since 1889, but was beaten by her Western foe last year 20—7, and this year 17—0. In the preseat season Cornell has defeated Ursinus 41—0, tied Colgate 0—0, won from Oberlin 32—12, lost to Carlisle 0—7, won from Bucknell 10—7, lost to Pittsburgh 7—20, Harvard 6—28 and Michigan 0—17. She beat Lafayette a week ago 10—3.

PRINCETON AND N. Y. STATE TEAMS

There has been the keenest of football rivalry between Princeton and Yale ever since 1873, and but few years from that time to now have been without their annual battles. Many gridiron enthusiasts have regarded the Yale-Princeton contest as the crowning "big game" of each season, and even the devotees of the Yale-Harvard or the Army-Navy game have admitted that plenty of thrills might be expected when the Tiger and the Bulldog met each other. Of late years the crowds have learned to expect sensational finishes and not to take their attention from the field for a moment until the final whistle had blown. Arthur Poe, the great Princeton star, set the precedent for this sort of thing in 1899, making his famous kick which won the game for Princeton when there were left but 36 seconds of play, and the games of 1907 and 1908 will long be remembered for the way Yale "came back" in the second half and triumphed. The longest field goal on record was made in a Yale-Princeton game, 65 yards, by J. T. Haxall of Princeton in 1882.

When it comes to a matter of statistics, the Blue has had decidedly the better of the series with Princeton. From 1873 to 1912 Yale won 19 games to Princeton's 10, while 8 games were tied. Of these, two, those of 1884 and 1886, were declared off by the referee after Yale had scored the greater number of points. Since 1883, when the numerical system of scoring came in, up to and including last year, Yale had made 311 points to Princeton's 128. From 1903 to 1912, inclusive, that is to say in the last decade, Yale won 6 games and Princeton 2, and there were 2 ties.

Princeton and Harvard have also played each other, a bit spasmodically, since 1877. There was no game in 1885, none between 1889 and 1895, and none for the long interval between 1896 and 1911. Including this year, when Harvard won by 3—0, Princeton has won 19 of the games played and Harvard 6, while 1 game was a tie. Since 1883 Princeton has scored 169 to Harvard's 75 points. The scoring of the old days would puzzle football followers of the present. The Princeton-Harvard game of 1880, for instance, was won by the Tigers, who scored 2 goals, 2 touch-downs and 6 safeties, to the Crimson's 1 goal, 1 touch-down and 4 safeties. In the previous year Harvard won with a score which would be even more odd under modern rules. She made 5 safeties to Princeton's 1 goal and 1 safety.

The Tigers and Dartmouth have had some close and interesting contests, in which the Green team has often given a good account of itself. None of the games between these two rivals had a stranger result than that of last year, when a freak goal gave the game to Princeton, the ball bounding over the goal posts. This year Princeton defeated Rutgers 14—3, Fordham 69—0, Bucknell 28—6, and Syracuse 13—0, was beaten by Dartmouth 0—6, beat Holy Cross 54—0, and lost to Harvard 0—3. A week ago she played Yale a tie, 3—3.

CAPT. PETERSON, COLGATE.

Colgate University has had a most successful season, including a victory over Yale. She tied Cornell 0—0, beat Amherst 21—0, and Hobart 46—0, lost to the Army 6—7, beat Trinity 6—0, Yale 16—6, and Rochester 27—0. Last week she closed her season by beating Syracuse 35—13.

In 1911 Colgate scored 6 points against the Army and last year she defeated Cornell 13—7, lost to Amherst 0—13, beat Hobart 12—2 and Trinity 24—7, had to cancel her game with Yale, lost to the Army 7—18, and beat Rochester 27—0 and Syracuse 7—0.

CAPT. HILFINGER, SYRACUSE.

Syracuse's final game this year will be with St. Louis on Thanksgiving Day. Yesterday she played the Indians. She defeated Hobart 41—0, Hamilton 18—0, Rochester 6—0, lost to Princeton 0—13, beat Western Reserve 36—0, lost to Michigan 7—45, and beat New York University 48—0. A week ago she played Colgate 13—35.

Although she has had Yale, and, usually, such strong elevens as Princeton, Brown and Cornell on her schedule for a number of years, Syracuse has scored many more points than the total of her opponents each season.

CAPT. ROBINSON, HAMILTON.

Hamilton this year defeated St. Stevens 26—0, lost to Syracuse 0—18, beat New York University 13—0, lost to Rochester 0—20, tied Hobart 0—0, beat St. Lawrence University 8—0, lost to Rutgers 0—38, and closed her season a week ago with the Union game, 12—0.

Hamilton did not have a very successful season last year. She won from Alfred and Middlebury only, tying Rochester 6—6 and losing to Hobart, Rutgers, St. Lawrence and Union. In her game with Union previous to this year, since 1893, she won 7, lost 2 and tied 4.

CAPT. SARVEY, UNION.

Union this season defeated St. Lawrence 20—0, lost to Rutgers 6—39, to the Massachusetts Aggies 0—20, to Wesleyan 3—16 and to Rochester 0—6, and beat Stevens 40—7. She closed her season a week ago, losing to Hamilton 0—12.

Last year, although she made but 39 points to her opponents' 52, Union lost only one game, to Wesleyan. She tied the Amherst Aggies 0—0, beat Hobart 7—6 and Worcester 7—6, tied Rochester 0—0, beat Rutgers 3—0, lost to Wesleyan 3—28, and beat Stevens 14—6 and Hamilton 15—12.

CAPT. HALL, HOBART.

Hobart College lost this year to Syracuse 0—41 and to Colgate 0—48, tied Hamilton 0—0 and St. Lawrence 0—0, and lost to Union 7—40. A week ago she ended her season against Rochester, losing 0—14.

Hobart last year lost to Syracuse 0—12, to Union 6—7, to Colgate 2—12 and to Rutgers 7—16, beat St. Lawrence 12—6, Alfred University 33—0 and Rochester 20—13. In 1909, 1910 and 1911 she defeated Union by scores of 5—3, 5—0 and 10—3, respectively.

CAPT. FORSYTH, ROCHESTER.

The University of Rochester, whose final game was with Denison yesterday, defeated St. Lawrence University 33—0, Hamilton 20—0, Union 6—0, Rensselaer Polytechnic institute 21—0, and lost to Colgate 0—27. She played Hobart a week ago 14—0.

Last year Rochester defeated St. Lawrence 32—0, tied Hamilton 6—6, tied Union 0—0, beat Rensselaer 7—6, lost to Colgate 0—27, lost to Hobart 13—20, and beat Gettysburg 7—0.

RECORDS OF EASTERN ELEVENS

CAPT. HOGSETT, DARTMOUTH.

Dartmouth's team this year has defeated the Massachusetts Agricultural College 13—3, Colby 53—0, University of Vermont 33—7, Williams 48—6, Princeton 6—0, Amherst 21—7 and Pennsylvania 34—21.

Dartmouth has played football for thirty-three years and in the last ten years has humbled such foes as Harvard and Princeton. The Stadium at Cambridge was christened at the Dartmouth-Harvard game in 1903, in which the Crimson was beaten 11—0. Dartmouth again beat Harvard 22—0 in 1907. Last year Harvard won by 3—0. Dartmouth beat Princeton 10—8 in 1908 and tied with her, 6—6, the next year. This contest was made famous in 1912 by the freak year. The game with the Indians a week ago, closing Dartmouth's season, ended in defeat, 10—35.

CAPT. HENRY, BROWN.

Brown University will end her play for the year with a game against Carlisle on Thanksgiving Day. She lost to Colby this year 0—10, defeated Ursinus 6—0, lost to Pennsylvania 0—28, beat Springfield Training School 26—6, the University of Vermont 19—0 and lost to Yale 0—17. She played Harvard 0—37 a week ago and Tufts yesterday.

Although playing Yale, Harvard, Carlisle and Pennsylvania, Brown has succeeded in gaining the majority of points in her seasons for several years. In 1910 she scored 198 points to her opponents' 47; in 1911, 187 to 53, and last year 117 to 107. In 1910 she administered a stinging defeat to Yale, winning 21—0, and during the last two seasons she scored on Harvard. Several All-American players have been chosen from Brown elevens.

CAPT. WELCH, CARLISLE.

Carlisle Indian School will end her season on Thanksgiving Day with the Brown game. Yesterday she played Syracuse. She defeated this season Albright 25—0, Lebanon Valley College 26—0, West Virginia Wesleyan 25—0, Lehigh 21—7, Cornell 7—0, lost to Pittsburgh 6—12, tied Pennsylvania 7—7, beat Georgetown 24—0 and Johns Hopkins 61—0. A week ago she beat Dartmouth 35—10.

Carlisle has always been an important factor in gridiron history. Last year she made 504 points, the largest total made by any team, to her opponents' 114, and beat Albright, Lebanon Valley, Dickinson and Villanova, tied Washington and Jefferson, beat Syracuse, Pittsburgh, Georgetown, Toronto, Lehigh and the Army 27—6, lost to Pennsylvania, beat Springfield Y. M. C. A. and Brown 32—0.

CAPT. McGAY, AMHERST.

Amherst College this year has defeated Rhode Island State College 14—0, lost to Colgate 0—21, Springfield 6—19, Trinity 0—14, Wesleyan 0—9, Dartmouth 7—21, and defeated Worcester Polytechnic 38—0. She closed her season with the Williams game a week ago, 12—0.

The football star had been declining for Amherst recently. Her games with her two principal rivals, Dartmouth and Williams, have been lost for the most part in the last five years. Thus Dartmouth, from 1908 to 1912, beat her 17—0, 12—0, 15—3, 18—6 and 60—0, while her scores against Williams were 4—0, 0—17, 9—0, 0—8 and 0—12.

CAPT. EUSTIS, WESLEYAN.

Wesleyan, who played her final game with Trinity yesterday, lost to Yale this year 0—21, to Bowdoin 3—7 and to Tufts 0—13, defeated Union 16—3, Amherst 9—0, Rutgers 20—9, and tied Williams 0—0. She played New York University a week ago 20—0.

Wesleyan played one of the early battles of football history with Yale in 1875. She beat Harvard 16—0 in 1884 and defeated Pennsylvania twice in the next four years. Then she won two championship banners of the old "Triangular League," of which Dartmouth, Williams and Amherst were members. Last year the team scored on Yale and beat Brown, running up 113 points to its opponents' 35.

CAPT. HUDSON, TRINITY.

Trinity College, ending her season yesterday with the Wesleyan game, had defeated Worcester Polytechnic 48—0, tied Bowdoin 0—0, beat Amherst 14—0, lost to Colgate 0—6, beat New York University 9—0 and Haverford 38—0. She lost to Rutgers a week ago 7—37.

Trinity for the six years, 1907-1912, won 36 of her games, tied 5 and lost 9, making a total of 927 points to her opponents' 242. Last year she defeated Middlebury 62—0, Worcester Tech 31—0, Bowdoin 27—0, lost to Colgate 7—24 and to Amherst 0—15, beat New York University 16—0 and Haverford 32—0, lost to Wesleyan 0—14 and beat Tufts 10—0.

CAPT. BENNETT, TUFTS.

Tufts College closed her season with the Brown game yesterday. This year she defeated Bates 15—7, New Hampshire State 52—0, Wesleyan 13—0 and University of Maine 19—6, lost to the Army 0—2, beat the Massachusetts Aggies 14—0 and Vermont 34—0. A week ago she beat Bowdoin 27—7.

Last year Tufts beat Amherst 20—0, lost to Maine 0—14, beat New Hampshire State 23—0 and Bowdoin 34—0, lost to the Army 6—15, to Wesleyan 0—14 and to Springfield Y. M. C. A. 6—7, beat the Massachusetts Aggies 15—0 and lost to Trinity 0—10. Tufts still remembers beating Harvard 6—0 in 1876, and also victories over Brown and Cornell.

CAPT. WHALEN, VERMONT.

The University of Vermont has had an unsuccessful season, losing steadily. She lost to Williams 0—20, to Dartmouth 7—33, to Bowdoin 3—13, to Brown 0—19 and to Tufts 0—34. Her game with Fordham had to be postponed on account of weather.

Last year Vermont beat Fort McKinley 13—0, Rensselaer 7—0, lost to Dartmouth 0—55, beat Massachusetts Agricultural College 9—7, lost to Springfield Y. M. C. A. 0—7, to Holy Cross 0—13, to Brown 7—12 and to Bowdoin 0—7.

CAPT. VINAL, WILLIAMS.

Williams this season defeated Rensselaer 14—0, the University of Vermont 20—0, lost to Harvard 3—23 and to Dartmouth 6—48, beat New York University 23—0, lost to Springfield Y. M. C. A. 0—6 and tied Wesleyan 0—0. A week ago she closed her season with the Amherst game, 0—12.

In the last few years Williams has been coming up in football. She defeated Amherst, her historic rival, in 1909, 1911 and 1912 by scores of 17—0, 8—0 and 12—0, respectively. Last year she beat Cornell 24—10 and scored on Harvard 3—23. She defeated New York, Wesleyan and Union, among others, in 1912.

IN MIDDLE ATLANTIC STATES.

CAPT. FLICK, LEHIGH.

Lehigh lost this season to Albright 0—60 and to Carlisle 7—21, won from Muhlenberg 7—0, lost to Yale 0—37 and to the Navy 0—39, and won from Swarthmore 50—0. A week ago she beat Haverford 16—3, and her final game was with Lafayette yesterday.

Last year Lehigh won all but one game, that against Princeton, which she lost 0—35. She had the consolation of shutting out the Navy by a score of 14—0. In 1911 the red letter game of her season was the one in which she tied Princeton 6—6.

CAPT. WAGONHURST, LAFAYETTE.

Lafayette this year tied Muhlenberg 7—7, lost to Pennsylvania 0—10 and to Yale 0—27, beat Swarthmore 10—0, Albright 7—0, and Ursinus 44—2, and lost to Pittsburgh 0—13. A week ago she played Cornell 3—10 and yesterday met Lehigh. She will close her season on Thanksgiving Day with the Dickinson game.

Last year Lafayette beat Muhlenberg, Ursinus, Pennsylvania and Dickinson. She beat the Navy 6—5 in 1903, held Princeton to a 5—0 score in 1904, tied Princeton 0—0 in 1908, and beat her 6—0 in 1909.

CAPT. WAGNER, PITTSBURGH.

The University of Pittsburgh will finish her season's play against Penn State Thanksgiving Day. This year she defeated Ohio Northern 67—6, tied the Navy 0—0, beat Carlisle 12—6 and Cornell 20—7, lost to Bucknell 0—9 and beat Lafayette 13—0. She lost to Washington and Jefferson 6—19.

Last year Pittsburgh defeated Ohio Northern 22—0 and Westminster 13—3, lost to Bucknell 0—6, to Carlisle 8—45, to the Navy 6—13, to Notre Dame 0—3, beat the University of Maryland 64—0, lost to Washington and Jefferson 0—13 and to Penn State 0—38. In 1909 Pittsburgh defeated Carlisle 14—3 and in 1910 won from Penn State 11—0.

CAPT. LUTZ, SWARTHMORE.

Swarthmore College this season tied Villanova 0—0, lost to Penn 0—20 and to Lafayette 0—10, beat Ursinus 6—3 and Johns Hopkins 10—7, and lost to Lehigh 0—50. She closed her season last week against Dickinson, losing 7—21.

Last year Swarthmore was very strong and beat Villanova 27—0, Lafayette 22—0, Penn 6—3, Navy 21—6, Johns Hopkins 40—6, and Ursinus 20—0, lost to Lehigh 0—3, beat Bucknell 14—13, and tied Dickinson 0—0.

CAPT. MILLER, PENN STATE.

Pennsylvania State College will end her season on Thanksgiving Day, playing the University of Pittsburgh. She defeated Carnegie Institute of Technology 48—0, Gettysburg 16—0, Washington and Jefferson 17—6, lost to Harvard 0—29 and to Pennsylvania 0—17, and beat Notre Dame 7—4. A week ago she played the Navy 0—10.

Penn State has done well on the gridiron of late years. In 1911 she won 8, lost none and tied 1, beating Cornell 5—0 and Pennsylvania 22—6, and holding the Navy to 0—0. Last year she won 8 games and lost none, beating Cornell 29—6 and Pennsylvania 14—0.

CAPT. ELMENDORF, RUTGERS.

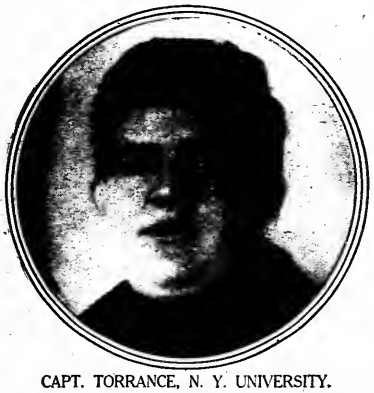
Rutgers closed her season yesterday with the Stevens game. She lost to Princeton this year 3—14, defeated Union 39—6, lost to the Army 0—29, defeated Hobart 71—0 and Rensselaer 13—0, lost to Wesleyan 9—20, and beat Hamilton 38—0. Last week she beat Trinity 30—7.

The record of Rutgers-Stevens battles is probably the longest between any two American colleges, extending from 1874. Out of 42 games played to 1912 Rutgers won 24, lost 13 and tied 5. Last year Rutgers beat Hobart, Hamilton, Rensselaer and Haverford, as well as Stevens. Losing to Franklin and Marshall, Princeton, Army and Union.

CAPT. STRETCH, STEVENS.

The Stevens Institute team, which played Rutgers its closing game yesterday, lost this season to the Army 0—34, to Haverford 0—6, to Rensselaer 0—13, to Barringer High School 0—34, beat Delaware 14—0, and lost to Union 7—40 and to Middlebury 0—61. She played Connecticut Agricultural College a week ago 28—7.

Last year Stevens lost to Princeton 0—65, to the Army 0—28, to Haverford 0—9, to Rensselaer 0—7, to Penn Military College 7—18, beat Johns Hopkins 13—12 and lost twice to Fordham 12—13 and 13—14, to Union 6—14, and to Rutgers 6—26. Stevens has been playing football, with but three years missing, since 1873.



CAPT. TORRANCE, N. Y. UNIVERSITY.

New York University, which closed its season yesterday by playing the Navy, had lost to Muhlenberg 0—54, to Hamilton 0—13, to Springfield 0—26, to Williams 0—23, to Syracuse 0—43, and to Trinity 0—9. Last week she played Wesleyan 0—20.

Last year New York won two games, beating Muhlenberg 6—0 and Rhode Island State College 14—0, but losing to Cornell 6—14, Wesleyan 0—26, Williams 6—16, Trinity 0—16, Princeton 0—54, and the Navy 0—39. In 1911 she scored 3 against Yale and lost to Williams 6—8.

CAPT. MULVEY, FORDHAM.

Fordham this season defeated St. Peters 27—0, Rensselaer 7—0, and Setoo Hall 21—0, tied Boston College 27—27, and lost to Villanova 0—43. A week ago she closed her year's play by losing to Holy Cross 0—60. In previous years Fordham had made a better showing at intervals; there have been seasons when the New York City players included stars who ranked with the best.

PLAYERS FROM THE NEAR SOUTH

CAPT. MILES, WASHINGTON AND LEE

Washington and Lee University will end her season on Thanksgiving Day by playing the A. & M. of North Carolina. She has defeated this Fall the Medical College of Virginia 27—0, Gallaudet 24—0, St. Johns 19—0, Johns Hopkins 34—0, Wake Forest 33—0, Virginia Polytechnic Institute 21—0, and North Carolina 14—0.

Last year Washington and Lee defeated the Medical College of Virginia 7—0, Western Maryland 30—13, lost to Georgetown 0—20, beat St. Johns College 24—14, Wake Forest 20—0, Davidson College 54—0, Virginia Polytechnic 20—6, the University of North Carolina 31—0, and the A. & M. of North Carolina 16—6. The team has been a consistent winner among the Southern elevens in recent seasons.

FOOTBALL IN THE SOUTH

By Andrew H. Patterson, Dean of the School of Applied Sciences, University of North Carolina.

Modern football began at Southern colleges in the early nineties. The first team at the University of North Carolina was coached by Hector Cowan in 1889, but the first game of the long series with the University of Virginia was not played until three years later. Further South the game was introduced by a contest in 1892 between the University of Georgia and the Alabama Polytechnic Institute. One year later Georgia played with a mixed team from the Georgia School of Technology, in which Gen. Leonard Wood, then a post surgeon at Fort McPherson, Atlanta, played the best game for Tech.

About this time, too, began the long and spirited series of games between Vanderbilt and Sewanee, and by 1894 so many Southern colleges were playing football that the Southern Intercollegiate Athletic Association was organized to exercise a general supervision over athletics of every kind. It is worthy of note that this association, because of the death of a Georgia player in a game in 1897, formulated a set of football rules to eliminate the dangerous features of the sport, somewhat similar to the present rules. After these rules were used for a year or two they were abandoned.

Several reasons militate heavily against Southern football—the lack of trained material from preparatory schools; the warm climate, unfitted for such a game as football; the great distance between colleges playing football, and their relative scarceness, resulting in heavy expenses and few practice games, and the small gate receipts. Where these causes are overcome or minimized, strong teams have resulted, notably at Vanderbilt, Annapolis, Virginia, Georgetown, and Texas, while at times good teams have been developed at Sewanee, North Carolina, Auburn, Georgia, and elsewhere.

AT SEWANEE AND TULANE.

Sewanee will end her season on Thanksgiving Day by playing Vanderbilt. She has defeated this year the University of Tennessee 17—16, lost to the University of Texas 7—13, and beat the University of Alabama 10—7.

Tulane University will close her season against Arkansas on Thanksgiving Day, having played Louisiana State yesterday. She lost this year to Mississippi College 3—13 and to the University of Alabama 0—26, defeated St. Louis 12—6, and lost to Missouri A. & M. 0—27. A week ago she played Southwestern 31—9.

Last year Tulane defeated Jefferson 37—0, Southwestern 94—0, and Mississippi College 10—6, lost to the University of Alabama 0—7, beat Missouri A. & M. 27—24, and lost to Louisiana State 3—21.

CAPT. CARTER, U. OF VA.

The University of Virginia will close her season with the annual game against the University of North Carolina on Thanksgiving Day. She has defeated Randolph-Macon 40—0, the University of South Carolina 54—0, Hampden-Sidney 53—0, Virginia Military Institute 38—7, the University of Georgia 13—6, and Vanderbilt University 34—0.

Last year Virginia defeated William and Mary 61—0, Randolph-Macon 45—0, South Carolina 19—0, and Hampden-Sidney 10—0, lost to V. M. I. 0—19, beat the N. A. L. Blues 7—0, lost to Vanderbilt 0—13 and to Georgetown 13—16, and beat North Carolina 66—0.

CAPT. COSTELLO, GEORGETOWN

Georgetown's final game this year will be with Holy Cross on Thanksgiving Day. She lost this season to the University of Cincinnati 0—46, beat Randolph-Macon 44—0, lost to the Navy 0—23, to A. & M. of North Carolina 0—12, to Carlisle 0—34, and to West Virginia Wesleyan 6—16.

Last year Georgetown defeated Randolph-Macon 39—0, Mt. St. Marys 27—0, Washington and Lee 30—0, and A. & M. of North Carolina 48—0, lost to Carlisle 20—34, beat the University of North Carolina 37—10, Washington College 84—0, the University of Virginia 16—13, and Virginia Polytechnic 24—3.

CAPT. ABERNETHY, U. OF N. C.

The University of North Carolina season's climax, as in other years, will be next Thursday's game with the University of Virginia. She defeated this year Wake Forest 7—0, Virginia Medical College 15—0, Davidson 7—0, and the University of South Carolina 13—0, and lost to Virginia Polytechnic Institute 7—14 and to Washington and Lee 0—14. She won again from Wake Forest, 29—0, a week ago.

North Carolina last year defeated Davidson 13—0, Wake Forest 9—2, Bingham 47—0, lost to Virginia Polytechnic 0—26, to Georgetown 10—37, tied South Carolina 6—6, lost to Washington and Lee 0—31, and to Virginia 0—66. The University of North Carolina has defeated The Tar Heels for the last three years.

FOOTBALL IN THE WEST

Of the colleges playing football in the Middle West this season, the most successful have been Notre Dame, the University of Chicago. None of these teams had one of the others on its schedule, so there has been no opportunity to award the palm on the basis of actual struggle. Notre Dame won all her earlier games, including that with the Army, and Kansas had an equally triumphant time of it, although she did not play rivals quite so strong.

Chicago closed her season yesterday with the Wisconsin game. This year she beat Minnesota 13—7, Indiana 21—7, the University of Iowa 23—6, Purdue 6—0, the University of Illinois 28—7 and Northwestern 14—0. One of her rivals, Indiana, which played Purdue yesterday, did not do so well. She beat Depew this year 48—3, lost to Chicago 7—21, tied the University of Illinois 0—0, defeated Ohio State 7—6, and lost to the University of Iowa 0—60. Another of the Middle Westerners that did not shine especially this year was Western Reserve, which will close the season on Thanksgiving Day by playing Case. She lost to Mt. Union 3—13, defeated Kenyon 17—7, lost to Syracuse 0—36, tied the University of Cincinnati 0—0, and lost to Oberlin 6—15.

Since the adoption of Rugby football by the University of California and Leland Stanford Jr. University in 1906, the game has met with a large measure of success. It is being played now by the University of California, Stanford University, University of Southern California, University of Nevada, Santa Clara University, and St. Mary's College.

In February, 1906, the first game of Rugby football was played in California by a foreign team, when the triumphant "All-Blacks" of New Zealand, at the close of their world tour, met the British Columbia team in an exhibition match. Since that time there have developed on the Pacific Coast frequent interchanges of visits with Australia and New Zealand, and with British Columbia. In 1907, 1908, and 1909 Vancouver sent its team to play Stanford and the University of California, and at each Christmas time either one or the other of the California institutions has sent its team North.

The Australian team on its world tour of 1910 visited California and played a combination team of all the universities. That same Summer, in response to an invitation of the New South Wales Rugby Union, a team of twenty-five football players picked from all the universites left San Francisco for a three months' tour of New Zealand and Australia. In 1911 Victoria sent its team to California, and in 1912 Australia sent a team for a series of games under the auspices of the California Rugby Union. This Fall the "All-Black" team of New Zealand, which is undoubtedly one of the greatest Rugby football teams in the world, has been in California again.

ON SOUTHERN COLLEGE ELEVENS

CAPT. BROWN, VANDERBILT

Vanderbilt University will end her season on Thanksgiving Day, playing Sewanee. This year she defeataed Henderson-Brown 33—0, lost to the University of Michigan 2—33 and to the University of Virginia 0—34, and defeated the University of Tennessee 7—6. A week ago Auburn beat her 14—6.

Last year Vanderbilt rolled up a big score, defeating Bethel College 105—0, Marysville 100—3, Rose Polytechnic 54—0, Georgia 46—0, Mississippi 24—0, Virginia 13—0. She lost to Harvard 3—9, beat Central of Kentucky 23—0, tied Auburn 7—7, and beat Sewanee 16—0.

CAPT. YOUELL, V. M. I.

Virginia Military Institute will close her season on Thanksgiving Day, playing Virginia Polytechnic Institute. She played Roanoke yesterday. This year she has beaten Hampden-Sidney 9—0, William and Mary 33—3, the University of Mississippi 14—0, lost to the University of Virginia 7—38, beat Baltimore City College 30—0 and A. & M. of North Carolina 14—7.

In the 1912 season V. M. I. defeated Hampden-Sidney 27—0, Richmond Medical College 30—0, Gallaudet 26—6, University of Virginia 19—0, University of Kentucky 3—2, lost to St. Johns 3—25 and beat Roanoke 34—0 and Johns Hopkins 21—0. In 1910 she lost to the University of Virginia 0—28 and in 1911 6—22.

CAPT. McGOWAN, U. OF S. C.

The University of South Carolina will close her season by playing the Citadel on Thanksgiving Day. She has lost to Virginia 0—54 and to North Carolina 0—13, and defeated the University of Florida 13—0. A week ago she played Davidson 10—0.

As football was abolished at South Carolina for two years, several years ago, it has taken time to rebuild the team. Last year the team lost to Virginia 0—19 and to Florida 6—10, defeated Wake Forest 10—3 and Clemson 22—7, tied North Carolina 6—6 and defeated Charleston College 67—0, Porters 65—0 and the Citadel 26—2.

CAPT. CARTER, WAKE FOREST.

Wake Forest College will close her season by playing Davidson on Thanksgiving Day. This year she lost to the University of North Carolina 0—7, to Washington and Lee 0—33 and to Gallaudet 7—47. A week ago she played the University of North Carolina again, 0—29.

Last year Wake Forest defeated the University College of Madison 33—0, lost to the University of South Carolina 3—10, to North Carolina 2—9, beat Horner Military Academy 44—0, lost to Washington and Lee 0—20, to A. & M. of North Carolina 0—12, to the Medical College of Virginia 14—23, and to Davidson 7—13.

CAPT. PICK, V. P. I.

The team of the Virginia Polytechnic Institute has lost this year to Washington and Lee 0—21 and has been generally behind its traditional form.

Last year the Polytechnic defeated Roanoke 40—0 and Hampden-Sidney 42—7, lost to Princeton 0—31, beat Western Maryland 44—0 and North Carolina 26—0, lost to the Medical College of Virginia 0—10 and to Washington and Lee 6—20, beat the University of West Virginia 41—0 and lost to Georgetown 3—24.

CAPT. NEWELL, AUBURN

Auburn (the Alabama Polytechnic Institute) has done well this year, defeating Mercer 53—0, Florida 55—0, Clemson Agricultoral 20—0, Missouri A. & M. 34—0, and the Georgia School of Technology 20—0. It is not unusual for Auburn to win. Football at the Institute has a history older than in most colleges. She beat Vanderbilt 14—6 a week ago.

CAPT. HAYLEY, U. OF TENN.

The University of Tennessee will finish her season on Thanksgiving Day, playing Kentucky State. This year she has defeated Marysville College 75—0, and has lost to Sewanee 6—17, to Vanderbilt 6—7, and to Alabama 0—6.

CAPT. VAN DE GRAAFF, U. OF ALA.

The University of Alabama this year lost to the University of Georgia 0—20, beat Tulane 26—0, and lost to Sewanee 7—10, and won from Tennessee 6—0.

CAPT. McWHORTER, U. OF GA.

The University of Georgia defeated this year the Northern Georgia A. C. 52—0 and the University of Alabama 20—0, lost to Virginia 6—13, and beat Georgia Tech. 14—0.

ON LEADING TEAMS OF THE WEST

CAPT. ROCKNE, NOTRE DAME

Notre Dame University will finish her play this year with the game against Texas on Thanksgiving Day, having played Christian Brothers College yesterday. She has defeated Ohio Northern 87—0, South Dakota 20—7, Alma 62—0 and the Army 35—13, and lost to Penn State 4—7.

Last year Notre Dame beat St. Viator 116—7, Adrian 74—7, Morris Harvey 39—0, Wabash 41—6, the University of Pittsburgh 3—0, St. Louis University 47—7 and Marquette 69—0, winning every game, and most of them by a comfortable margin.

CAPT. PATTERSON, MICHIGAN

The University of Michigan has defeated Case 48—0, Mount Union 14—0, lost to the Michigan Aggies 7—12, beat Vanderbilt 33—2, Syracuse 43—7 and Cornell 17—0. A week ago she beat the University of Pennsylvania 13—0.

Michigan has been playing football with Pennsylvania since 1899. She won 3 games of the series prior to this year and tied one. She has had a still longer series with Ohio State. Out of 14 games Michigan won all but 2, which were ties, and scored 447 points to Ohio's 15. Last year Michigan beat Case 34—0, the Michigan Aggies 55—7 and Ohio State 14—0, lost to Syracuse 7—18, beat South Dakota 7—6, lost to Penn 21—27, and beat Cornell 20—7.

CAPT. ALDWORTH, MINNESOTA

The University of Minnesota, before her closing game yesterday with University of Illinois, beat South Dakota 14—0 and Ames 25—0, lost to Nebraska 0—7, and beat North Dakota 30—0 and Wisconsin 21—3. A week ago she played Chicago 7—13.

Last year Minnesota lost to South Dakota 0—10, beat Ames 5—0, Nebraska 13—0, Iowa 56—0 and Illinois 13—0, and lost to Wisconsin 0—14 and to Chicago 0—7. In 1911 she beat both Illinois and Chicago by scores of 11—0 and 30—0, and came through the season with all but one game won. That one was a tie with Wisconsin 6—6.

CAPT. WEIDLEIN, KANSAS

The University of Kansas, which played Missouri her closing game yesterday, has defeated William Jewell College 7—0, Washington University 55—7, Drake 11—0, the Kansas Aggies 26—0, and Washburn 14—0. A week ago she played Nebraska 0—9.

Last year Kansas beat St. Mary's 62—0 and Warrensburg 29—0, lost to Drake 0—7, to Nebraska 3—14, to Oklahoma 5—6, and to Washburn 0—10, and beat Missouri 12—3. In 1910 and 1911 she tied with Missouri, her chief rival, by scores of 5—5 and 3—3, respectively.

CAPT. TANDBERG, WISCONSIN.

The University of Wisconsin, whose game with Chicago yesterday closed her season, has defeated this season Lawrence College 58—7 and Marquette 13—0, tied Purdee 7—7, lost to the Michigan Aggies 7—12 and to Minnesota 3—21, and beat Ohio State 12—0.

Wisconsin last year defeated Lawrence 13—0, Northwestern 56—0, Purdue 53—0, Chicago 30—12, Arkansas 64—6, Minnesota 14—0 and Iowa 28—10, coming through the season without a defeat and scoring far more points than her opponents.

CAPT. GEISSMAN, OHIO

Ohio State University, which played her closing game against Northwestern yesterday, has defeated this Fall the Ohio Wesleyan 58—0 and Western Reserve 14—8, tied Oberlin 0—0, and lost to Indiana 6—7 and to Wisconsin 0—12. She defeated Case a week ago 13—0.

Ohio last year defeated Otterbein 55—0 and Denison 34—0, lost to Michigan 0—14, beat Cincinnati 45—7, Case 31—6 and Oberlin 23—17, lost to Penn State 0—37, beat Ohio Wesleyan 39—6, and lost to M. A. C. 20—35.

CAPT. BROWN, TEXAS

The University of Texas, which will end her season on Thanksgiving Day by playing Notre Dame, has defeated Fort Worth Polytechnic 14—7, Austin College 27—6, Baylor University 77—0 and Sewanee 13—7.

CAPT. McGINNIS, IOWA.

The State University of Iowa closed her season with yesterday's Nebraska game. This year she has defeated Iowa Normal 45—3, lost to Chicago 6—23, and beat Northwestern 78—6 and Indiana 60—0. She beat Ames a week ago 45—7.

Last year Iowa defeated Normal 35—7 and Cornell (Iowa) 31—0, lost to Chicago 14—34 and to Minnesota 7—56, beat Indiana 13—6 and Ames 20—7, and lost to Wisconsin 10—28. In 1911 Minnesota beat her 24—6.

CAPT. PEART, CALIFORNIA

The University of California lost this year's game by a score of 8—13 to her chief rival, the Leland Stanford Jr. University.

GAME PLAYED FROM EARLY DAYS

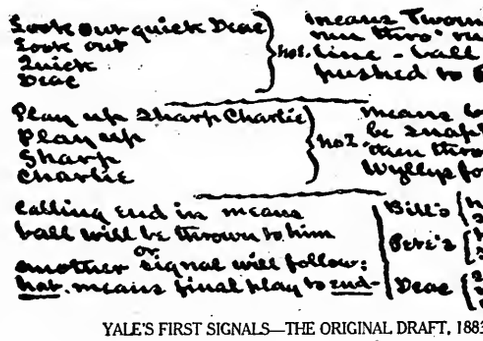
A BRIEF HISTORY OF FOOTBALL, BY PARKE H. DAVIS.

DAVID S. SCHAFF, '73, YALE

Yale's first Varsity Captain. Author, divine and professor in Western Theological Seminary.

ROBERT GRANT, '73, HARVARD

First President of Harvard Football Association. Author, judge and overseer of Harvard University.



YALE'S FIRST SIGNALS—THE ORIGINAL DRAFT, 1883.

Football was played at Sparta 2,300 years ago. Several of the writers of ancient Greece refer to it and describe its methods. It was played upon a square field marked by side-lines, centre-lines, and goal-line, and because the initial play, opening the game, was a long forward pass down the field, the Spartans called the game harpastum, meaning a throwing forward—a word still preserved in the English word harpoon.

The Romans learned the game from the Greeks. Julius Pollux, a Roman writer, is authority for the statemeat that Augustus Caesar appointed a commission to revise the rules of the Grecian game and make it suitable to military diversions for his legions. Pollux says the field was changed from a square to a rectangle, that the goals were marked by posts, that 27 players constituted a side, divided into 15 forwards, 5 defensive backs, 4 half backs and 3 full backs; that a score was achieved by kicking the ball or carrying the ball between the posts, that two fouls such as kicking the ball out of bounds equaled a goal, and that goals were exchanged after each score.

It was from the Roman legions that ancient Britain learned football, and for centuries in olden England football thrived with such vigor that the royal proclamations of King after King against the game, because it distracted from the pratice of archery, failed to check its growth.

With the coming of 1800 football was played at all of the secondary schools of England—Eton, Harrow, Westminster, Rugby and the others. The style of play at each school was different, but all were characterized by a prohibition against carrying the ball. A crisp November day came in 1823, however, when a hundred boys were playing on Old Bigside at Rugby. Two hours came and went without a score. Finally 5 o'clock pealed out across the Close to terminate the game. With the first stroke of the bell a long punt came down the field, and a young Rugbian, William Webb Ellis, with the inspiration of desperation, suddenly caught the ball and, contrary to rule and custom, started to run with it. His opponents leaped upon him, but, shaking them off, he fought and dodged his way to the goal-line. The run was a foul, but it so delighted the school that in a few weeks a great change was made in the game. A runner was permitted to carry a ball. Thus was produced the Rugby game.

WILLIAM S. GUMMERE, '70, PRINCETON

Princeton's first Varsity Captain. Now Chief Justice of the New Jersey Supreme Court.

Organized football in America originated in a game between Princeton and Rutgers, played on Nov. 6, 1869, under an original set of rules resembling "soccer" more than "rugger." In 1870 Columbia appeared as a competitor, and Yale in 1872. The game played by these institutions was based upon the rules of the London Football Association, in which the ball was not permitted to be carried, whence comes the name of "Association." In 1874 Harvard appeared, and, fortunately, choosing as its first opponent McGill University of Canada, was forced to play under Rugby rules. The next year Harvard challenged Yale to play under the same code. This game was attended by a young Princeton football leader, William Earle Dodge, and so impressed was he with the Rugby style of play that he returned to Princeton and persuaded his comrades also to adopt it. But these pioneers at Princeton did more. They issued an invitation to the football men of Columbia, Harvard, and Yale to meet them in the Old Massoit House at Springfield to organize an intercollegiate league and to adopt the Rugby rules as a basis for their common game. The meeting was held on Nov. 26, 1876, and the result was the adoption of Rugby football as the American intercollegiate game.

Ingenious young America since that day, year after year, has put many clever innovations in the original Rugby rules. Our scrimmage displaced the English scrimmage in the late '70s, and at the same time the number of players was reduced from 15 to 11. With the early '80s came a system of running by the side of the player with the ball—called at the time "guarding." This later developed into permissible offside interference, familiar to all under its present name of "interference." In 1887 the English waist tackle gave way to the American knee tackle, and with this change came the contracted rush-line in place of the widspread line of forwards of the old Rugby game. The decade of the '90s saw flying wedges and their derivatives, momentum mass plays, come and go. In 1905 came the famous forward pass, and in 1910 the abolition of interlocked interference. In the last three years many minor details have been perfected, until to-day, out of Rugby football of 1876, we have a distinctive American game, ingenious, well balanced, and justly meriting its title as king of school and college sports.

In 1874 Harvard appeared, and, fortunately, choosing as its first opponent McGill University of Canada, was forced to play under Rugby rules. The next year Harvard challenged Yale to play under the same code. This game was attended by a young Princeton football leader, William Earle Dodge, and so impressed was he with the Rugby style of play that he returned to Princeton and persuaded his comrades also to adopt it. But these pioneers at Princeton did more. They issued an invitation to the football men of Columbia, Harvard, and Yale to meet them in the Old Massoit House at Springfield to organize an intercollegiate league and to adopt the Rugby rules as a basis for their common game. The meeting was held on Nov. 26, 1876, and the result was the adoption of Rugby football as the American intercollegiate game.

Ingenious young America since that day, year after year, has put many clever innovations in the original Rugby rules. Our scrimmage displaced the English scrimmage in the late '70s, and at the same time the number of players was reduced from 15 to 11. With the early '80s came a system of running by the side of the player with the ball—called at the time "guarding." This later developed into permissible offside interference, familiar to all under its present name of "interference." In 1887 the English waist tackle gave way to the American knee tackle, and with this change came the contracted rush-line in place of the widspread line of forwards of the old Rugby game. The decade of the '90s saw flying wedges and their derivatives, momentum mass plays, come and go. In 1905 came the famous forward pass, and in 1910 the abolition of interlocked interference. In the last three years many minor details have been perfected, until to-day, out of Rugby football of 1876, we have a distinctive American game, ingenious, well balanced, and justly meriting its title as king of school and college sports.

MISS JESSIE WILSON'S PHOTOGRAPH CHOSEN BY HER FAMILY

This Picture of the President's Second Daughter, Who Will Wed Francis Bowes Sayre in the White House on Tuesday, Is the One Most Liked by Mr. and Mrs. Wilson and the Two Sisters of the Bride-to-Be. In the Lower Right-hand Corner Is the Photograph Which Mr. Sayre Considers His Best.

MAKING MIDDIES STRONG AT U. S. NAVAL ACADEMY

Scientific Measuring of Muscles.

From morning to night they live by rules which preclude enervating idleness and keep them to the top notch of physical trim.

The Thorough Test For Every Student.

Every muscle in the body is examined and those not fully developed are checked against the midshipman. Then a prescription of exercises, written by the Physical Instructor, must be followed rigidly. No student can be graduated from the Academy until he is adjudged fit physically and mentally.

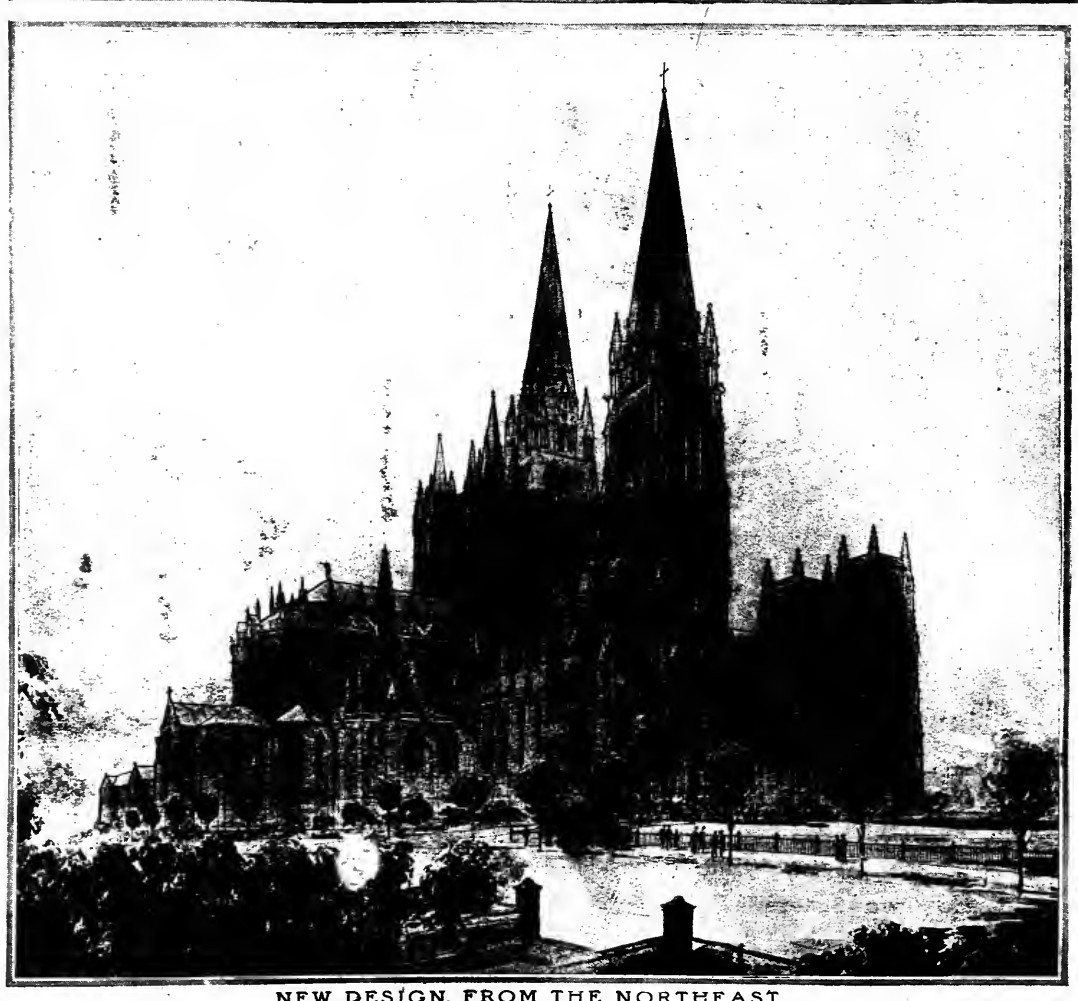
How Plan of Episcopal Cathedral Has Been Changed



NEW DESIGN, FROM THE NORTHEAST.

Drawing prepared for the completion of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine by Ralph Adams Cram. This picture is published in advance of submission of the plans to the Trustees, and therefore has not yet received the approval of the Cathedral authorities.

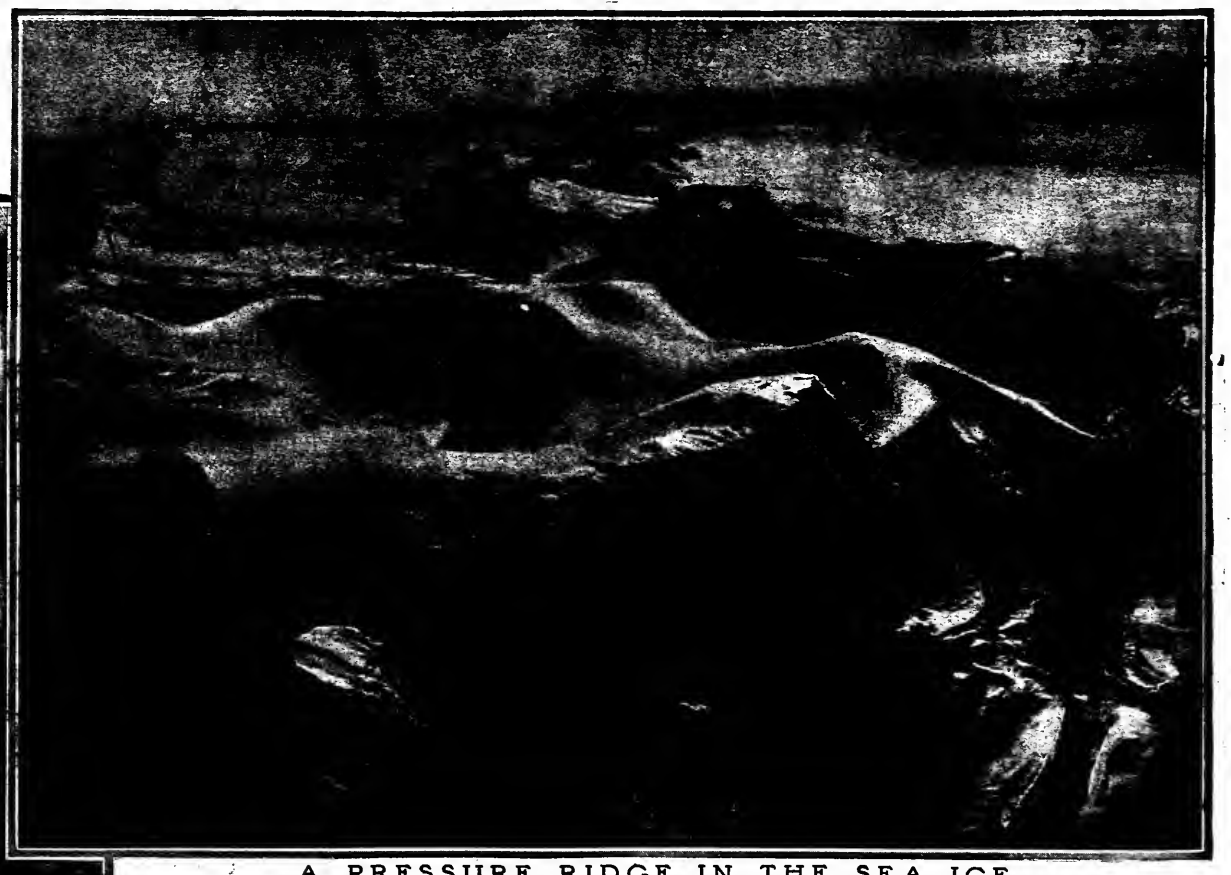
OLD DESIGN, FROM THE SOUTHWEST.

Plans by Heins and La Farge were first prepared twenty years ago. Mr. Cram succeeded C. Grant La Farge as Consulting Architect of the Cathedral in June, 1911, when the work on the structure was not more than one-third completed.

WONDERS OF ANTARCTIC AS SEEN BY CAPT. SCOTT'S PARTY

These Pictures, from the Two-Volume Narrative of the Famous South Pole Expedition, Just Published by Smith, Elder & Company in London, and Dodd, Mead & Company in New York, Are Reproductions of Photographs Made by Herbert C. Ponting and Other Members of the Exploring Party.

POINT OF THE BARNE GLACIER.
The Terra Nova, Capt. Scott's Ship, Passed This Huge Cliff of Ice in McMurdo Sound.



A PRESSURE RIDGE IN THE SEA ICE.

Capt. Scott wrote under the date of Tuesday, March 21, 1911: "The rippled snow surface of the ice foot is furrowed in all directions and covered with briny deposit—a condition we have never seen before. The ice foot at the S. W. corner of the bay is broken down, bare rock appearing for the first time. The sledges, magnetic huts, and in fact every exposed object on the Point are thickly covered with brine." This note was written in Discovery Hut, at the south end of Ross Island. An idea of the difficulties caused by pressure ridges may be gained from a note, dated October 27, 1912, and concerning the Northern Party: "We got away after breakfast, keeping inside Depot Island and getting beautiful smooth ice nearly clear of snow, which lasted to Cape Ross, where we had to cross bad pressure ridges off the Cape. The ridges were so bad we had to cut passages for the sledges with ice axes."

★ Servette Serves Your Meals

BETTER THAN A MAID.

The most welcome Christmas gift for any woman is Servette, because it solves one of her vexing problems—how to serve the meals satisfactorily without the aid of a maid.

Servette is a "serve-self" arrangement, consisting of a revolving plate glass top upon a handsome base. Standing in the centre of your table, it enables the diners to help themselves without disturbing or interrupting others.

It renders a maid's services unnecessary, promotes sociability at meals and saves hundreds of steps. It is not only useful but is ornamental. Liberal Trial Offer.

WRITE TO-DAY FOR CATALOG showing different styles of Servette, so that you can make your selection in time to have it arrive before Christmas. We include handsomely engraved Christmas card with name of giver.

Woodland Country Club, Chatsworth, N. J.

Winter Country Club
Camp and Bungalow Colony

A party of congenial business and professional men recently acquired the beautiful property now known as the Woodland Country Club, located on the Jersey Central Railroad, midway between Lakewood and Atlantic City, in the heart of the pine forest area of Southern New Jersey, with a dry tempered pine atmosphere, far superior to Lakewood.

This property comprises over 5,000 acres of land, about nine miles of picturesque river and Lake Shamong. It was improved by its former owners at a cost of over $200,000.00, with commodious and modern club buildings, woodland walks and drives, golf links, tennis courts, etc.

This entire property was "found" and acquired for an amount less than the actual cost of the improvements thereon; the Woodland Country Club was organized in April, 1911, and the clubhouse opened and the property put in first-class condition at an additional expenditure of about $50,000.

The Club is conducted like an old-fashioned Virginia Plantation. Accommodations and all supplies furnished at cost without further charges of any kind to members, their families and guests.

Each member may personally select an acre Bungalow site, which is deeded to him, free and clear, without cost or other obligations. No dues for five years, no assessments of any kind at any time.

Upon the opening of the third season the Governing Committee invites to membership a limited number of socially agreeable business and professional men on the original and favorable basis on which this beautiful property was acquired. Total cost $300. Limited Membership $100.

A letter addressed to the Secretary, 430 Marbridge Building, corner Broadway and 34th St., New York City, will bring photographic views, list of members from many States, and full particulars.

CARDEN DEMANDS OIL FIELD GUARD

Tells Mexican Foreign Minister Rebels Are Destroying British Property.

TROOPS ARE PROMISED

Huerta Oil Tax Favors Waters-Pierce to Detriment of Pearson Syndicate.

ADD TO OUR BORDER FORCE

War Department Officials Dispatch Another Regiment, Making 20,000 Men in All.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

MEXICO CITY, Nov. 22.—The German, British, Belgian, and Japanese Ministers called on Señor Moheno, Foreign Minister, this afternoon and had a long conference with him.

The matters under discussion were not made public, although it is believed that the Ministers had a discussion of the situation with Señor Moheno.

Sir Lionel Carden officially notified Señor Moheno that British cruisers were coming to Mexican waters, and the Japanese Minister communicated the sailing of the Izumo from Japan.

The British Ambassador is also understood to have made strong representations, looking toward the protection of the Pearson oil interests in the Tuxpam district, where the rebels are reported to be committing depredations and preventing the shipment of oil despite the assurances given by them to Admiral Fletcher, who commands the United States squadron here.

An official of the Pearson Mexican Eagle Company called on Señor Moheno this afternoon to ask protection for his company's property in Tuxpam. Señor Moheno gave him assurances that troops would be sent there for that purpose.

Oil Tax Works Unequally.

The war tax of 75 centavos (37½ cents) per ton imposed by the Huerta Government on crude oil, is calculated in the opinion of many oil producers to force them to sell out their interests since they will be unable to conduct operations at a profit. They say it will affect the Pearson interests considerably, but independent small producers will be most injured.

The Waters-Pierce Company will suffer little, it is said, and may be able to compete with the Pearsons on a more equal basis. Owing to the fact that the tax applies to producers rather than refiners.

The Waters-Pierce Company is in the field as a refiner rather than a producer, having only one well in operation at the present time. The great majority of its oil is contracted for from small independent producers, who will be forced to pay the tax since the price has already been set in existing contracts.

The Pearson syndicate being both a producer and a refiner, will, according to opinion here, be able to pass the tax on to the consumer, but will be unable to compete in prices with the Waters-Pierce concern, which will be exempted from payment. This, it is asserted, will enable the latter to undersell the Pearsons and still make a larger margin of profit than at present.

Government officials are unwilling to comment upon this phase of the tax at present, although there are indications that the ultimate outcome of it was not foreseen by the Government. It is believed, however, that its attitude might have been different had not the support of the Pearson interests been withdrawn from Huerta.

The independent producers, headed by the Pearson managers, have been meeting frequently of late and have presented a petition to the Department of Finance protesting the unfairness of this tax and the fact that it tends to crush the independent producers, forcing them to sell to the Waters-Pierce or other large concern which is able to sacrifice present profits.

Government Press Agents.

The Mexican Government recently evolved a novel publicity scheme, consisting of paying salaries to Mexicans who should obtain posts as correspondents of American papers. Several of these Mexicans are also volunteering news to correspondents who are employed by papers which were unwilling to employ them directly. The officials think this is bringing about good results. It is said that this not only enables the Government to circulate versions of military operations, but to obtain the publication in the United States of editorial comments published in Government papers like the Imparcial, Diario, and Independente.

These Government press agents are headed by a young Captain of the Medical Corps, who speaks English and was formerly in the Consular Service in New York. The other agents confer with him, while he acts as a sort of official censor. Papers recently arriving from the United 175 Badly Hurt During Season—Injuries Fewer Than Last Year.

14 FOOTBALL DEATHS.

CHICAGO, Nov. 22.—Fourteen players were killed and 175 were injured in football games in the season which virtually closed to-day. This record of casualties is only slightly below that of 1912, when thirteen players met death and 183 were injured.

These figures were compiled from press reports and published here to-day. The injured include only those who suffered broken bones, torn ligaments, severe strains and sprains, and internal injuries.

Of the fourteen deaths, thirteen were due to injuries received this year. Charles Sweitzer, formerly a Hamline University player, died on Nov. 17 at St. Paul, from a complication of diseases resulting from injuries received several years ago. Other fatalities resulted, with few exceptions, from fractured skulls, broken necks or other spinal injuries.

Only two college players were killed. Vernon Belyea, of the Norwich University was thrown heavily in a game with Haly Cross and died three days later. Edward Morrissey, captain of the St. Ambrose College team, suffered a broken leg on Sept. 25 and died of blood poisoning.

GETTYSBURG, Penn., Nov. 22.—Homer H. Wray of Leechburg, Penn., a student at Gettysburg College, died last night from the effects of an injury sustained in a football game between the Gettysburg and Dickinson College reserve teams at Carlisle three weeks ago.

One of the bones in his chest was fractured and abscesses formed on the lungs.

PASS EMPLOYES' WIVES.

Interborough Takes New Step to Aid Those Who Work for It.

The Interborough and New York Railways Companies announced yesterday to their employes that beginning on Dec. 1 they would issue to the wife of each of their married employes who has been in the service of the companies for one month a pass entitling her to free transportation over the system on which her husband is employed. Here is the announcement:

This privilege is extended as a further step in the work for the welfare of employes. The officers and Directors hope that it will be accepted as a compliment appropriate to the Thanksgiving holiday, and that it will prove to be a welcome convenience to the wives of the employes. While no restriction will be made upon the use of the pass, it is respectfully suggested that its use may be of advantage in connection with the stores which the company maintains for the benefit of employes.

The stores to which the notice refers are established in the car barns of the Interborough, and sell goods at greatly reduced prices. They were set up a few months ago with the idea of providing the Interborough and New York Railways employes with the best of household goods at practically wholesale prices.

UNTERMYER SELLS HIS DOGS

He Disposes of $60,000 Kennels Shortly After Prize Winner Dies.

Samuel Untermyer has disposed of his kennels, scattered his fine and costly collection of dogs to different buyers, dismissed his kennel master and has kept for himself only a half dozen collies of no great prize winning history to serve as sentinels for his home, Greystone, on the Hudson above Yonkers.

The most famous of all the Untermyer dogs was the Squire of Titton, a magnificent collie, winner of many prizes and ribbons and worth, in his prime, all of $10,000. Mr. Untermyer was very fond of the Squire and when, some two or three weeks ago, the dog died of old age, Mr. Untermyer's interest in his kennels waned abruptly. He decided to scatter them. The $60,000 worth of collies and other breeds were sold and the kennel master left for Philadelphia to serve at the Knicklayde Kennels of Thomas Hunter on the outskirts of that city. Thus ends the kennels of Greystone.

TROTH SUDDENLY BROKEN.

Miss Bessie Martin and Dr. H. C. de V. Cornwell Are Not to Wed.

Mr. and Mrs. E. Howard Martin announce that the engagement between their niece, Miss Bessie Martin, and Dr. H. C. de V. Cornwell of this city has been broken.

The couple's engagement was announced on Nov. 5. Dr. Cornwell is a son of the late Capt. Charles C. Cornwell of the United States Navy, and is a graduate of Harvard, class of '97. He is a member of the St. Nicholas Society.

On last Thursday Mr. and Mrs. Francis Hyde gave a box party at the afternoon session of the Horse Show for Miss Martin and Dr. Cornwell, and the news of their broken engagement will come as a surprise to their friends.

E. Howard Martin, at his home, 160 West Fifty-ninth Street, said the family had no statement to make other than that contained in the formal announcement of the broken engagement.

Dr. Cornwell, who has an office at 40 East Forty-first Street and resides with his mother at 3 East Thirty-fifth Street, said the engagement was broken by mutual agreement.

$1,000,000 RADIUM CARGO.

150 Tons of the Ore Shipped to France to Produce 11 Grams.

The largest shipment of radium ore ever sent out of this country left yesterday for France on the steamship Chicago of the French Line. It amounted to 150 tons, and will yield a little more than eleven grams of pure radium, which, it was said, will represent a cash value of $1,000,000.

Hermann G. C. Thofehrn of Paris, who came here on a special mission to procure a large amount of this mineral for France, said that he had gained control of the entire output of radium producing mines in Mexico, and also owned 80 per cent. of the ore production in the United States.

SEEKS CUSTODY OF THAW.

Sheriff Asks Court to Let Him Take Slayer to New York State.

CONCORD, N. H., Nov. 22.—The delivery of Harry K. Thaw into the sole custody of Sheriff Holman A. Drew of Coos County for his transfer to New York State was asked for late to-day in an answer filed in the United States District Court by the Sheriff to the petition for a writ of habeas corpus presented a few days ago by Thaw's counsel.

This writ was asked for after Gov. Felker had acceded to New York's request for the extradition of Thaw in connection with charges of conspiracy arising from his escape from Matteawan on Aug. 17.

Thaw availed himself of a perfect Indian Summer day to climb Mount Kearsarge, twenty-five miles from this city, in company with Sheriff Drew.

SAYS SHE KILLED MARSHALL FIELD, JR.

Vera Scott, Arrested in Los Angeles for Badger Game, Makes Startling Allegations.

'SHOT HANDLING REVOLVER'

Explanation of Young Field's Death at the Time—Woman Also Says She Killed Husband in 1910.

Special to The New York Times.

LOS ANGELES, Cal., Nov. 22.—Vera Scott, who says she is the wife of a Kansas City musician, and who is in the city jail here on a charge of vagrancy, in connection with an alleged attempt to work the badger game, told the police to-day that she shot and killed Marshal Field, Jr., in a Chicago clubhouse on Nov. 23, 1905.

The Scott woman asserted that after the shooting, Marshall Field, Sr., gave her a large sum to leave the country.

The woman asserted further that it was she who shot and killed Reese Prosser on a train in Montana in June, 1910. Prosser was killed by his divorced wife. The woman was tried by a Montana jury and was acquitted on the ground of self-defense.

The woman laughed heartily and often during the recital of her story at the ease with which she had been able to "handle" men in various parts of the country. Her story of how she had come to Los Angeles eight months ago with only $3, and since then had made $60,000 by wheedling a few wealthy Pasadena and Los Angeles men brought uproarious peals of laughter from her.

"I learned to laugh while was a chorus girl," she said, "and since then I have found it one of my best assets."

A Chorus Girl in New York.

Mrs. Scott said she was born in Chicago in 1885. Her view of life, she said, came from her work as a chorus girl in the Weber-Fields company in New York. She said she played in "Hoity Toity" and "Hanky Panky."

"I was good looking then, and I was in demand," she added. As Viola Gilmore she was known to her associates, according to her story. She never had a chance to calmly recall her life, she said, until she went to jail. So she sat calmly back and told it.

"I am a daughter of Chicago," she said. "My parents were Leroy and Evelyn Le Gardineer. They were French. My father was a well-to-do merchant and stock broker. I went to New York and got into the chorus. When Louis Clarkson came along I married him. He was a broker at the time, making lots of money and spending it. Poor fellow, he's dead now.

"After Clarkson came Reese Prosser. He was the son of Thomas Prosser, an Ohio 'coal king.' We got along well until he became savage. Besides, I wanted liberties. So I took them. I went to Chicago. One day while in the Annex grill, I was introduced to Marshall Field, Jr. He took a fancy to me. I told him that I was a married woman and that I was going under the name of Vera Leroy. That's the 'mysterious and beautiful Vera, the French girl' who was mentioned later in connection with his death.

"After I had known him for some time he said he was going to have a party for me. I laughed and said, 'Hurry.' Well, the party arrived. I almost made me dizzy to see him spend money that night. It was wine, and more wine.

"A cab took us to a place known as the Everly Club. Emma Everly and a girl named Alice were with us. Field offended me. I remembered he had a revolver and I got it. I was inflamed with drink and told him I would teach him never to do that sort of thing again. I aimed the gun at him and told him to stand aside. The trigger must have been very finely set, for it pulled before I intended.

"Marshall Field fell mortally wounded. Emma Everly and Alice both saw the shooting.

"Field said to me, 'Don't get excited. I won't tell. Call me a cab quick and get me out of this, and don't say anything.'

Says She Got $20,000.

"I fainted. Things were reeling so that I couldn't stand. The next thing I knew I was going away in a cab alone. Field was in another cab. He went to his home, and I went to a small family hotel on the North Side. The next day Marshall Field, the father, came to me. He told me to get out of the city, to go to New York, and he gave me $10,000 to use. I did not leave for several days. Each day I went to another hotel at the request of the Field representative.

"Then I went to New York. I stayed there until more money could come from the Field agent, and then I went West, against the wishes of the Field family. I wanted to see a man in Portland, and then go to the Orient. They insisted that I go abroad.

"I got about $20,000 out of the Fields for leaving the country. Then I went to the Orient. In Shanghai I met a gay crowd. Among them was Count George Fadowski, who had much money. I promised to marry him, and he gave me a beautiful set of pearls and other jewels. I left when I got tired of the country.

"I came back quietly and went to Cleveland, where Rees Prosser, my husband, who knew nothing about the Field affair, was glad to get me back. In 1910 I met Leroy Scott, fell in love with him, and told my husband that we must get a divorce.

"I got one against his wishes. That was in Seattle. He followed me when I was going to meet Scott, and had to shoot him on the train in Montana. I had the trial in Libby, Mont., and was acquitted. Then I married Mr. Scott in Kansas City."

SHOT PROSSER ON A TRAIN.

Divorced Wife Claimed Self-Defense and Montana Jury Freed Her.

Special to The New York Times.

CLEVELAND, Nov. 22.—Vera Prosser, now known as Vera Scott, shot and killed her divorced husband, Reese Prosser of this city, on June 1, 1910, while they were on an eastbound Great Northern train near Libby, Mont. Prosser had obtained a divorce from her on May 18 of that year. His wife had sued him for divorce on July 14, 1909, but her husband had never answered the suit, which charged neglect, and it was not pressed to an issue.

Mrs. Prosser was tried by a jury in Libby, Mont., but was acquitted on the grounds of self-defense. She declared that her husband applied an epithet to her and attacked her, whereupon she fired the shot that killed him.

The Prossers were married in this city on Nov. 24, 1905, and lived at a hotel for a year afterward. Mrs. Prosser formerly was an actress and made the hotel her home. She was a divorced woman when Prosser married her. Prosser's home was in Lisbon, Ohio. A year or so after their marriage the Prossers went to Lisbon to live. Their married life was not happy and was marked by

SIX FORMER PRIESTS TO BE PROTESTANTS

Christ's Mission Is Providing Means for Converts' Training to Preach.

Six former members of the Roman Catholic priesthood, two of whom were also members of monastic orders, are being cared for now by Christ's Mission and Reformed Catholic, an independent evangelical mission for the conversion of Roman Catholic clergymen, at 331 West Fifty-seventh Street. The mission is providing means for the necessary training required for entry of the six into the Protestant ministry and mission field.

Only one of the priests is from a near by parish. The officials of the mission declined to disclose his name yesterday on the ground that publicity would annoy him and handicap his future work. He is said to have resigned recently a parish of 1,000 communicants near New York.

The expenses of one of the monks John Hadj, who was a member of the Maronite's monastery, at Mount Lebanon, Syria, were paid by the mission to bring him here last July, at the request of Miss Caroline Holmes, head of the Jebail Mission at Beirut. He is being trained for church and mission work in Syria, where he will be sent after he becomes a naturalized citizen of this country.

Another of the priests is said to be from a parish in the Middle West. Three others came here direct from Italy, one from a monastery there. He is Giovanni Ongaro, who is studying and doing mission work among the Italians here under the auspices of the Mission Aid Society, recently organized among the women patrons of Christ's Mission, with Miss Jennie E. Taylor of 110 West Fifty-fifth Street as temporary Treasurer.

"We make it a rule here not to announce the names or history of the work of the Catholic priests who come to us," said the Rev. Dr. W. Russell Collins, an Episcopalian clergyman and Secretary of the mission, of which Dr. Manuel Ferrando is the head. Dr. Ferrando is said to have been a member of a Spanish monastic order and later a Bishop engaged in mission work in South America.

One of the priests, said the Rev. Dr. Collins, is completing a course of study at a theological school near Bloomfield, N. J., where he has joined the Presbyterian Church and is a candidate before the Presbytery of that district for admission as a minister.

"Two of the former priests are taking a course of study in the Bible Teachers' Training School, at Lexington Avenue and Fiftieth Street, preparatory to entering mission work," said Dr. Collins.

"While we carry on work here for laymen, our chief effort is directed toward the aid of Catholic clergymen who wish to join the Protestant ministry. But we have no connection with any particular denomination, the converts being free to choose for themselves the church they prefer.

"The prominent priest who becomes a convert to Protestantism is often able to take care of himself, and it is the poor and unknown priest, especially those from religious orders, who are without money and cut off from their friends and old associates, who most need our assistance."

Mgr. M. J. Lavelle, Vicar General and rector of St. Patrick's Cathedral, could not be reached last night for a statement concerning the priests said to have come under the jurisdiction of the mission. His secretary, Thomas J. Dunne, said there were no records available tending to identify the ex-priests.

The Italian converts, he said, could not have had a right to perform any part of their religious work here under claim of any connection they may have had with the church in Italy. Without the name of the priest who is said to have resigned a near-by parish Secretary Dunne said it would be impossible to verify that statement.

MAY ASK FOR POLICE SEARCH FOR STOVER

Friend Says Gaynor's Death Preyed on Missing Park Commissioner's Mind.

The mystery of the whereabouts of Park Commissioner Charles B. Stover was no nearer solution yesterday than it had been since he suddenly left the city more than a month ago without telling any of his friends or associates where he intended going. It was rumored that Mr. Stover was in Washington yesterday, and that he would leave for New York in the afternoon. He did not arrive here, however, and for the first time since his disappearance it was suggested that a search be made for him. Up to an early hour this morning the police had not been asked to take a hand in the matter, but it is said that they may be requested to do so to-day unless the Park Commissioner returns.

It was William J. Lee, Supervisor of the Bureau of Recreation of the Department of Parks, who suggested that a hunt be made for Mr. Stover. Mr. Lee has known the Park Commissioner intimately for a long time, and he admitted yesterday that he was beginning to feel worried over his friend's protracted absence. Mr. Lee intimated that the death of Mayor Gaynor preyed upon Commissioner Stover's mind.

John N. Bogart, former Commissioner of Licenses, has furnished the first tangible information of the missing Park Commissioner's whereabouts. Mr. Bogart on Friday night said that he met Mr. Stover in the Union Station in Washington, D. C., during the day and that Mr. Stover told him he expected to leave that city for New York on the 5 o'clock train on Saturday afternoon. Mr. Bogart called up Acting Park Commissioner Louis F. La Roche on the telephone yesterday and told him of his meeting in Washington with the Commissioner.

Mr. Bogart said that Mr. Stover told him that he intended to spend Saturday afternoon at the Congressional Library, in Washington, and that in all probability he would call upon a friend there, Miss Hifton, a librarian. Mr. Bogart told Mr. La Roche that he had seen Commissioner Stover alight from an incoming Baltimore train at the Washington Union Station at 10:45 o'clock Friday morning, and that the Commissioner appeared to be in excellent health. He said that Mr. Stover told him that he had been having a good time on his vacation and had spent considerable time in Baltimore. Mr. Bogart said Mr. Stover asked him what he was doing in Washington and that he had replied: "I am looking for you."

Mr. Bogart went on to say that in the subsequent conversation he had forgotten to ask the Commissioner why he had failed to tell his friends and his associates in the Park Department his whereabouts. The Commissioner, said Mr. Bogart, invited him to spend the afternoon with him in Washington, but he had to decline. He said the Commissioner told him that he might come on either the Pennsylvania or the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad.

Supervisor Lee wrote to Mayor Kline yesterday giving his version of the disappearance of the Park Commissioner.

"Mr. Stover, to my mind, never seemed to rally from the shock of Mayor Gaynor's death," wrote Mr. Lee. "It was noticed by the Commissioner's friends that he took the Mayor's death very much to heart.

"Mr. Stover was an untiring and conscientious worker. He was a man of extremely good health and possessed of kindly impulses and strong convictions. I sincerely trust that the judgment of his critics will be suspended until his whereabouts is discovered. There was no need for Mr. Stover to run away, for he had nothing to fear and he was afraid or no man. I suggest that a search for Mr. Stover be started."

Commissioner Stover's secretary, Ira H. Patchen, and his intimate friend, Robbins Gilman of the University Settlement, 184 Eldridge Street, where Mr. Stover lives, said last night that they had received no word from the Commissioner and did not know when he would return.

PHONE CALL TRAIL TO HIGHWAY GRAFT

Whitman Gets Additional Information About Alleged Cooperstown Conference on July 5.

CHARGES AGAINST CARLISLE

Barber Company Rival Files Affidavits with Governor — Grand Jury Meets Again To-morrow.

The post village of Cooperstown, N. Y., county seat of Otsego County, promises to play an important part in the future developments of District Attorney Whitman's graft investigation. Additional information reached the District Attorney yesterday bearing on the alleged conference in a hotel at that village on July 5, where decisions highly favorable to the Barber Asphalt Paving Company are said to have been reached.

Present at this alleged conference, according to the information which has reached the District Attorney, were William Sulzer, then Governor of New York; State Highway Commissioner Carlisle, and George H. McGuire of Syracuse. All three men have denied being in Cooperstown on July 5.

This prosperous little Summer resort is situated in the midst of hop fields and is exactly midway between Syracuse, the home of McGuire, and Albany. As the crow flies, the distance to Cooperstown from either Syracuse or Albany is about sixty miles—just a pleasant two hours' run by automobile.

But the obvious convenience of a midway town as a proper place for an important conference is not the only clue which has caused the investigators to keep an eye on Cooperstown. It was learned yesterday that the record of a long distance telephone call from a hotel there to the offices of the Highway Department in Albany, made on the afternoon of July 5, had been dug up by the investigators.

Who entered that call from the hotel in Cooperstown was not revealed. It was said, however, that James K. McGuire, ex-Mayor of Syracuse and known throughout the State as "the Barber Asphalt Company man," was at the Albany end of the wire when the call was put through. "Jim" McGuire, according to information which has reached Mr. Whitman, was in the offices of the Highway Department for the very purpose of receiving that call. "Jim" McGuire is now sojourning in the West Indies.

Mr. Whitman is interested in finding out when the ex-Mayor will return. He has it on the word of George H. McGuire, brother of "Jim," that "Jim" has sailed away. Mr. Whitman has had so much untruthful testimony from McGuire during the last few days, however, that he will probably take others into consultation before he becomes convinced of the big politician's departure from his jurisdiction.

Details of the alleged conference, it was learned yesterday, are contained in formal charges, with affidavits, filed with Gov. Glynn on Friday against Commissioner Carlisle. These charges are made by Henry A. Rubino, counsel for the Warner-Quinlan Asphalt Company, chief competitor of the Barber Asphalt interests for contracts on State work. The full text of the charges, it was said, would not be learned until released by Gov. Glynn.

It was learned yesterday, however, that the charges before Gov. Glynn include mention of thirty telegrams said to have been sent out from the Highway Department to as many State road contractors within an hour after the telephone conversation between Cooperstown and Albany. These telegrams, it is alleged, gave orders to the highway contractors that road specifications as regards the use only "natural solid" asphalt must be lived up to. This "natural solid" asphalt is produced solely by the Barber Asphalt Company, it is said. The charges, it is understood, also contain the statement that the Warner-Quinlan Company, which had sold large quantities of its "liquid" asphalt to these thirty contractors, was not notified until July 8 of the enforcement of specifications which barred everything but Barber asphalt.

The direct accusation made by Rubino against Carlisle, it is said, charges violation of the highway law, which calls for the wording of specifications so as to allow free competition.

When the regular General Sessions Grand Jury, which indicted Everett P. Fowler of Kingston, meets again tomorrow morning it is expected that evidence relating to the fight between the rival asphalt companies will be presented. Mr. Whitman, it was said, would also produce Fillmore Condit, New York manager of the Union Oil Company of California, as a witness. Condit has made affidavit that George H. McGuire and James K. McGuire tried to dicker with him for State business, and that his company, in violation of the Corporation law, was asked for a campaign contribution for the Democratic State Committee. George H. McGuire admitted under oath in the John Doe proceedings on Friday that he had made a proposal of this nature to Mr. Condit. He said that he did not know he was committing a crime, and that he had intended to charge the campaign contributions against his commissions on the sales to the State and to contractors on State jobs of the Union Oil Company's products.

A number of the contractors who are said to have received telegrams from the highway Department ordering the use of Barber asphalt only in road contracts are also expected to appear before the Grand Jury. Sensational developments are expected.

Following the hearing before the Grand Jury some of the witnesses will be heard in the John Doe proceedings, which will be resumed before Chief Magistrate McAdoo at 2:30 P. M. to-morrow. It is expected that more will be heard about the methods employed by the Democratic State and local committees in the raising of campaign funds from contractors on State jobs.

Charles F. Murphy, Jr., nephew of the Tammany chief, who was named by George H. McGuire on Friday as his partner in the profits of the bonding business relating to contracts on the State barge canal, the State highways, the aqueduct, and the local subways, could not be found yesterday at his office, 76 William Street, or his home, 309 East Seventeenth Street. Reporters sought to question Mr. Murphy about the report that he and the McGuire brothers did 80 per cent. of the bonding business on State jobs.

CARLISLE TO GET CHARGES.

Gov. Glynn Will Make No Comment Till Commissioner Answers.

ALBANY, Nov. 22.—The charges against John N. Carlisle will not be made public by Gov. Glynn until he has submitted them to Mr. Carlisle. The Governor refused to-night to indicate anything regarding the nature of the allegations. He expects to receive Mr. Carlisle's answer early next week.

"I think it would be very unfair to Mr. Carlisle to make these charges public before he has seen them and has had an opportunity to make whatever answer to them he may desire," the Governor said. "I probably shall submit them to him on Monday.

"The charges were handed me by an attorney before I left New York to-day. I have read them over, in part, but I shall not say a single word about the nature of the accusations nor express any opinion on them."

KITCHENER MAY BE VICEROY

His Appointment to India Expected if Lord Hardinge Retires.

By Marconi Transatlantic Wireless Telegraph to The New York Times.

LONDON, Nov. 22.—Bombay dispatches referring to the possibility of Lord Kitchener succeeding Lord Hardinge as Viceroy of India receive some credence here.

An Anglo-Indian correspondent of The Pall Mall Gazette points out that Lord Hardinge still has two years to serve, but that he has not entirely got over the shock of the outrage at Delhi during the Durbar, when an attempt was made to kill him with a bomb, and therefore may resign.

The Viceroyalty was practically promised to Lord Kitchener after Lord Minto's term of office had expired, and it was only on account of his supposed lack of experience in civil administration that the appointment was withheld. His success in Egypt would make it difficult for the Government to refuse the Viceroyalty to him should Lord Hardinge retire.

BULGARIAN CRISIS NEAR.

Austrian Ruler Said to Have Denied Ferdinand's Appeal for Aid.

By Marconi Transatlantic Wireless Telegraph to The New York Times.

VIENNA, Nov. 22.—Sofia dispatches affirm that the Bulgarian situation is assuming a critical character. The general exasperation against Czar Ferdinand is growing to such a height that it is not believed he will be able to retain his throne long.

It is learned from an excellent source here that Ferdinand, as a last resort, has been trying to obtain the Austrian Emperor's support, but that it was refused after a conference between Count Berchtold, Minister of Foreign Affairs, and the German Ambassador.

CARDINAL FORBIDS DANCES.

All Forms Will Be Barred at St. Vincent's Hospital Benefit.

The tango and other new steps have so monopolized the dance floors and Cardinal Farley's disapproval of them is so emphatic that he has requested the elimination of all dancing from the annual entertainment given by the Ladies' Auxiliary of St. Vincent's Hospital for the benefit of that institution.

That entertainment, which usually has meant a clear $5,000 for St. Vincent's, has always been a dance, and the members of the auxiliary are searching their minds for some sort of entertainment with no dancing in it that will draw anything like the patronage of old. Thus far they have hit upon nothing.

BRYAN AND GRANDSON HUNT

John B. Leavitt, In Sporting Garb, Takes the Secretary Duck Shooting.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 22.—After pouring hot shot into several newspaper canards this morning Secretary Bryan went down the river to shoot ducks.

Soon after 11 o'clock the Secretary was at his desk, going over correspondence with department chiefs, when his little grandson, John Bryant Leavitt, walked in, dressed in frontier costume, with a little shotgun on his shoulder.

"Grandpa," said the boy, "you promised to go duck hunting at 11 o'clock. You're late already. Let's go."

Mr. Bryan quickly dismissed his assistants, saw there were no dispatches of importance requiring his attention, and with his grandson set out for an afternoon's sport.

AUTO HITS FARNUMS.

Actor, Though Hurt, Pursues Chauffeur in Another Car.

Dustin Farnum, the actor, and his wife were knocked down and run over by an automobile at Madison Avenue and Twenty-seventh Street at midnight last night, just after they had left the Horse Show in Madison Square Garden. The front wheel of the automobile which was going south in the avenue, passed over the left wrist of Mrs. Farnum and over the right leg of the actor.

A large crowd of men and women saw the accident, and when the chauffeur, instead of stopping, put on more speed and continued on, several men sprang into automobiles and followed. Notwithstanding his injuries, Mr. Farnum jumped into one of the many automobiles put at his disposal and gave chase after first turning his wife over to several women who volunteered their services. At Twenty-fifth Street and Madison Avenue, Mr. Farnum overtook the automobile and had a policeman arrest the chauffeur. Mrs. Farnum was taken in an automobile to her apartments in the Hotel York.

Shortly before 1 o'clock this morning Mr. Farnum appeared in the East Twenty-second Street station and made a complaint against the chauffeur, who said he was George W. Murphy of 118 Fife Street, Forest Hills, L. I. He said a Mrs. Chase of Forest Hills owned the auto. He was put in a cell charged with intoxication and reckless driving. Mr. Farnum told the police his wife was under the care of his private physician, Dr. Leisor, and that her condition was serious.

EARLE COOPER INJURED.

Auto Racer Bruised and Cut When Car Dashes Through a Fence.

SAN JOSE, Cal., Nov. 22.—Earle Cooper, winner of several automobile classics on the Pacific Coast, including this year's Santa Monica road race, lies seriously injured in a hospital to-night as the result of an accident which occurred to-day while he was tuning up his racing car for a contest against time.

The car blew out a rear tire while he was going at the rate of seventy miles an hour, and rather than attempt to make the turn at the head of the race track he shot straight for the outside fence. The car circled through a field and crashed back through the same fence. Cooper was severely cut and bruised and his back was wrenched, but at the hospital it was said to-night he would recover.

BRICKLEY'S KICKS WIN FOR HARVARD

Crimson Full Back Scores Five Field Goals, Beating Yale, 15 to 5.

OUTPLAYS THE ELI ELEVEN

Harvard Scores Victory Over Old Rivals in Annual Gridiron Battle at Cambridge.

BIG CROWD SEES CONTEST

Guernsey's Toe and Safety All That Saves Blue from Shutout Before 44,000 Spectators.

Special to The New York Times.

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Nov. 22.—He is a short, chunky youngster of 21 Summers. His black hair is curly, and there is always a smile on his boyish face. He has a nerve of chilled steel, and is so cool that he could face the jaws of destruction without a quiver. This is Charley Brickley, whose name was engraved in football history at Soldiers' Field this afternoon as one of the greatest individual gridiron heroes who ever wore the flaming crimson of Harvard. Brickley was the whole Harvard team against Yale this afternoon, and with his talented toe he booted the pigskin over Eli's goal post five times, scoring all the points, which buried the Blue in a 15 to 5 defeat.

The "newsies" here to-night are not screaming about Harvard triumph. They are yelling "Wuxtra! Wuxtra! All about the New Haven Wreck!" The New Haven wreck is Capt. Ketcham's team, exhausted, played out to the last ounce of human strength, and beaten decisively by Percy Haughton's big Crimson team, which showed itself to be one of the best drilled football machines which ever trod on a gridiron.

"Fair Harvard," all her sons, young and old, are delirious with joy to-night. It is the first time Harvard has ever defeated Yale in the huge Greek stadium, and it is the first time since way back in the gray past of 1875 that Harvard has ever defeated Yale two years in succession. Arm in arm Harvard parades the streets of Boston town; they crowd the hotels and restaurants; they jam the theatres, and create the greatest turmoil this city has known for years.

Yale, with all its fighting spirit, all its grit, and bulldog tenacity, was no match for Harvard. Guernsey kicked one field goal, and O'Brien of Harvard made a stupid play, which scored a safety against his own team.

The field goal of three points and the safety of two points was the total of Yale's effort against this irrepressible eleven. Perhaps never before on a college gridiron has anything ever been seen like Brickley's work this afternoon. Wisely, the Crimson team had been constructed around this marvelous drop kicker. With a snappy aggressiveness which would not be denied, Harvard rushed the ball within striking distance of the Eli goal. Then they called on Brickley. He booted over four goals from the field and kicked one from placement, and one of the marvelous incidents of the day was that Brickley tried another kick from placement. One was on the 45-yard line, and he missed. How he missed it no one knows.

The game was one of the most picturesque football spectacles ever seen in this country. More than 44,000 people jammed the colossal cement amphitheatre. A day as warm as an early September afternoon, a gleaming sun and a cloudless sky made a perfect day for the game. All the girlish beauty of the land mingled with the student thousands who crowded tier upon tier in the great coliseum.

Crimson Students In Song.

When the Yale rush was smothered, when Charley Brickley had made his last plunge, and when the last fatigued Eli warrior

Harvard line had the latter groggy when the first half ended.

Rest Revives Crimson.

The ten minutes' intermission was just what Harvard needed. The bruised and battered line had time to collect its wits. And when the third period came Yale found that in that turbulent second period the team had shot its bolt.

No team ever fought more fiercely or more earnestly than Yale did. The Elis knew they had a chance, and they were making the most of it, but they tried so hard in that second period, when their proud march toward triumph was interrupted by intermission, that they were about tired out. With gameness and undying nerve they fought it out to the end. They struggled like madmen to break through and smother Brickley as he made his kicks.

Stubborn to the last degree, the Harvard defense wound itself around the talented Brickley so compactly that no one could get near him. Surrounded by the sturdy wall of Crimson players, Brickley was as safe from interference as if he had been in a safety deposit vault.

Brickley Was a Picture.

Brickley kicking his field goals was a picture. As cool as an arctic Winter, he was at all times. He invariably chose a smooth place on the lawn-like gridiron. He held the ball in his hands and his keen blue eyes measured the distance perfectly. He waited and waited. To the crowd in the Yale stands it seemed like ages. No hurry or flurry, no nervousness, Brickley's mind was on his task. He took his own sweet time and smiled at the Yale players as they battled to get at him. Not a kick was blocked, as a defense had been built around the Crimson kicker that could not be broken. His unerring toe always caught the ball right which he sent every time spinning like a top over the crossbar.

Except for Yale's game rally in the second period the Blue was outplayed by a far superior team. But it was not beaten until the last minute, and Harvard had to watch the Yale players every second. Alexander Wilson was threatening to break loose, and Martin, the centre rush, and Avery, the plucky Yale end, were forever smashing to swing through in a way that had Harvard scared.

Ketcham, with fierce aggressiveness was playing the game of his life, he played so hard that he was inexcusably rough and twice Referee Langford had to warn the Yale Captain. Once Ketcham was so bad that Yale was penalized 15-yards, and this penalty put Harvard in position to have Brickley kick his first field goal.

In the third period Yale became wobbling in the face of the Crimson assault. Two more field goals in that period, put Harvard on easy street. It was not until then that the hope of the Yale crowd began to fade. The great horde of Yale men in the East stand stood up and with bared heads broke into that impressive college chant.

With tremendous volume the song rolled over the field, "For God. For Country, and for Yale."

That was the finish. The fast tiring players on the field heard it. It rang in their ears, their fatigue was forgotten. Once again they braced against the Crimson, and they tried for all they were worth. But it was too late. They could stop the Harvard rushes and hold their own in punting, but they could not get at Brickley.

Brickley was everywhere. When every scrimmage unraveled itself on the gridiron and a Yale man came out of the heap he found himself looking at Brickley. Brickley was wonderful on the defense and tore through time and again and stopped the Yale backs.

He intercepted forward passes with uncanny ease. Football seemed second nature to him. He knew where every Yale play was going and was always in the way. Yale wasn't fighting a football team. They were gamely carrying on a hopeless fight against one man. Ketcham and Warren and Knowles tackled him and buried his nose in the grass. They hurled him down with fury, but they couldn't hurt him. Every time Brickley came up smiling. When they threw him he bounded up again as if on springs. It would seem that he took his medicine like a soldier and was always ready to make a drop kick when called upon.

Harvard Machine Supports Brickley.

Most of Harvard's game was Brickley. It was Brickley this and Brickley that, and Brickley the other thing. No man has ever meant quite so much to a football team. An irresistible, irrepressive terror was Brickley. And yet it was the wonderfully well-drilled Harvard machine that made it possible for the Harvard wonder to beat Yale singlehanded—or, rather, single-footed. It was a Harvard team perfectly taught in the fundamentals of football that kept the enemy away while he kicked goal after goal, each one of which meant a deeper humiliation for Yale.

This Harvard team made no mistakes. It handled the ball without a muff. It carried its campaign through without an error.

Another surprise of Harvard's game was the punting of Eddy Mahan. From the start he had the edge on Knowles of Yale. His kicks were high and far, and the Harvard ends were down under them like rockets. Wilson got few chances to run back punts. Harvard's ends outplayed and outgeneraled the Blue wings from the start.

Mahan caught Knowles's first punt after the kick-off, and like a frightened deer he rushed the ball back 25 yards before Ketcham hurled him. Brickley and Bradlee hurled themselves into the line, but found it stiff. Then Mahan kicked. Knowles kicked back and Mahan kicked again and Harvard gained on the kicks.

Yale, with confidence in Knowles, kept on kicking. Mahan early in the first period broke loose and rushed the ball back 23 yards. Then he hurled a forward pass at O'Brien, but it was intercepted. It was third down, so Brickley, with a nerve that must be reckoned with, tried a drop-kick from the 50-yard line and it failed. No wonder.

Logan mixed another forward pass into the attack and that also failed. Yale got the ball on the 20-yard line and Knowles tried a line plunge, but was abruptly halted. Knowles had to kick. Brickley caught the ball and two or three Yale players were on him at once. Ketcham came tearing along and jumped into the fray. For this Ketcham was warned and Yale was penalized 15 yards. Mahan then took the ball and rushed to Yale's 29-yard line, but the Yale defense stiffened and Brickley dropped back to the 25-yard line and put over the field goal. It was easy for him.

The picture which followed this score will never be forgotten. The whole stand was on its feet. Every student brought forth a crimson handkerchief and the Stadium became a riot of resplendent color. The man behind the bass drum did his best to break it, but he couldn't. The horns blared forth like a peal of thunder. The noise became earsplitting and the roar of approval of Brickley's feat became deafening. Harvard had started. From that time they went on with renewed energy.

O'Brien Makes a Blunder.

On the kick-off after this play the ball from Guernsey's toe hit the goal-post and bounded back on to the field. O'Brien, the Harvard end, became sadly confused in the excitement. He picked up the ball for some unaccountable reason and planted it behind his own goal line.

There was a long wrangle between the players and Referee Langford finally decided that it was a safety. After the first period, with the score 3 to 2, the Yale stand began to sing "Good Night Harvard," which is the best college song that has been sung in years, and maybe Yale couldn't sing it, too. In fact, the singing and cheering at to-day's game by both sides was the best that has ever been heard at a football game.

Shortly after play was resumed Mahan got off a kick which sailed over Wilson's head and netted Harvard about 75 yards. It was a beauty.

Early in the second period Knowles punted to Yale's 37-yard line, where Mahan made a fair catch, and from that line Brickley made a kick from placement.

Field Goal for Yale.

After Mahan had punted to Wilson the Yale quarter back fumbled the ball, but recovered it, and then pulled off the best run of the game, dodging up the field for a run of 35 yards and planting the ball on Harvard's 35-yard line. Knowles and Ainsworth, in two vicious rushes, carried the ball to the 25-yard line. Guernsey dropped back to the 35-yard line and kicked a field goal, and then it was Yale's turn to yell. And they did.

With renewed encouragement Yale awoke to the best outburst of football of the game. After Mahan and Brickley and Bradlee had smashed through for 15 yards, Yale showed a wonderful brace and took the ball away from Harvard on downs. Knowles, on a fake kick formation, made a pretty run of 25 yards and Yale's chances looked bright.

Ainsworth skirted the end for 15 yards and Harvard was falling back in an alarming way. Time was nearly up and Yale cohorts implored Guernsey to try a field goal. He fell back. With only a few seconds of time left, he seemed an hour getting the ball. Capt. Ketcham patted his men on the back and told them to hold as they never held before. A silence fell over the Stadium as Guernsey dropped back to the 35-yard line. He made a pretty try at the goal, but missed the cross-bar by a few inches. Then the first half was over.

The Yale crowds were in high spirits between the halves, and began to sing "Bulldog, bulldog, Wow Wow Wow—Eli, Eli Yale!" Wilson opened the third period with a 15-yard run through the line.

Knowles followed this up with a break of 30 yards through the Harvard team, and then Yale was through. Harvard came back like a raging storm, and the Crimson began to batter down the Yale backs. Yale fought gamely, but it was a losing fight.

"Red" Brann, Yale's promising end, was sent into the strife. He began to tackle like a fiend, and for a while Yale picked up hope.

But Harvard's attack became overwhelming. The Crimson began to ride over them roughshod. Dana at end for Harvard started to skirt the Yale ends, and they couldn't stop him. Yale was slipping. Brickley broke loose on a plunge through the line and went along on a revolving run of 30 yards. He brought the ball again within kicking distance of Yale's goal, and from the 51-yard line kicked another field goal.

Harvard Yells for a Touchdown.

In the last period Brickley, Mahan, and Dana all made splendid rushes and pushed the Yale line back. Yale was penalized 15 yards for holding in the line, and Brickley and Mahan brought the ball down to Yale's 10-yard line. The Harvard people yelled for a touchdown. The Crimson backs in a furious attack assaulted the sturdy Blue line, and it was like a rock. Yale wouldn't budge.

"Hold 'em," yelled the Yale stands, and they were firm. But Brickley walked coolly back to the 20-yard line and booted over another field goal.

When the game was over Harvard stormed onto the gridiron; every student in Cambridge was there, and behind the band the Crimson boys, frenzied with joy, went through the dazzling mazes of the serpentine dance in a way that has never been seen before on Soldiers' Field. It was a sight never to be forgotten. Every student in the parade threw his hat over the goal posts, and then he went got their hats back. The jubilation lasted for an hour after the game, and then the throngs of victorious students moved on to Boston. They took the old town by storm. The streets became alive with roistering young men. Dignity was forgotten. Boston blue laws were obliterated, all restraint was lost, and at midnight in street, avenue, and alley Harvard's victory was being sung to a star-lit sky.

Way down Washington Street comes the echo of a dying song:

Glory, glory for the Crimson,
For this is Harvard's day.

It grows fainter and fainter and is finally lost, and then comes along a new horde of Crimson Indians taking up the song.

It was a great victory for a great team. Boston's head aches from the noise and the revelry.

HOW GAME WAS PLAYED.

Brickley's Goal Kicking Gives Harvard Victory Over Yale.

Special to The New York Times.

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Nov. 22.—The bright warm sun of an Indian summer smiled on white-ribbed Soldier's Field this afternoon when the hostile Captains, the bushy-haired Ketcham of the Elis and blonde Storer of Harvard walked from opposite sides of the field and met with a hearty handshake, just as if they liked each other. An impressive hush fell over the Stadium as the coin flipped from Referee Bill Langford's fingers. Storer called the turn and Harvard defended the West goal.

Otis Gurnsey of Yale tinkered with a little pile of dirt on the 40-yard line and placed the yellow egg in position to receive his toe. Cautiously he approached the ball in his stride and with a dull thud the ball boomed into Harvard territory. The game was on.

The ball soared over the goal line and Hahan ran the ball back to the 20-yard line, where Avery tackled him. Mahan carried the ball on a line plunge without gain and punted on the next play. Yale let the ball roll and Ainsworth fell on it at the 24-yard line. Ainsworth went through right tackle for three yards, but the ball was called back and Harvard was penalized five yards for offside play. Knowles punted to Logan, who caught it at the 30-yard line and returned it five yards, where Marting caught him.

Mahan made one yard through left tackle. Then he punted to Wilson who fumbled and recovered on Yale's 32-yard line. Ainsworth made three yards on the right side of the line and was tackled by Brickley. Knowles punted to Mahan on Harvard's 35-yard line and the latter swept around right end to Yale's 45-yard line, where Knowles tackled him.

Brickley went through left guard for five yards and was tackled by Guernsey. On the next play the same player made only a yard when he was stopped by Ketcham. Mahan tried a forward pass to Hardwick which hit the ground and the ball was called back to the 39-yard line.

Brickley tried a drop-kick from the 47-yard line, but his kick was hurried and did not carry to the goal post. Yale put the ball in play on the 30-yard line. Ainsworth made two yards through right tackle. Knowles punted to Mahan at Harvard's 48-yard line.

Mahan kicked over the goal line for a touchback and Yale again put the ball in play on her 20-yard line. Gilman caught Guernsey for a loss of one yard. Knowles punting to his 40-yard line, where the ball was allowed to drop to the ground. Mahan failed to gain at the right tackle. Brickley likewise failed on a plunge at left guard, where Warren stopped him. A forward pass by Logan was intercepted, and Harvard was still on Yale's 41-yard line. Mahan punted over the goal line in the corner of the field for another touchback, and it was Yale's ball on her 20-yard line.

Brickley Kicks Field Goal.

Yale was penalized 15 yards for Ketcham's unnecessarily rough play. Brickley made two yards and Mahan added two more. Brickley dropped back as if for a drop kick, but Bradlee shot through the line to Yale's 18-yard line, giving Harvard the first down. Avery made the tackle, Brickley was stopped with one yard gain through the line. He pushed through for two yards the ball on Yale's 14-yard line. Brickley dropped back to the 26-yard line and kicked an easy goal from the field.

There was uproar in the Harvard stands when the teams lined up again for the kick-off. Guernsey sent the ball against the goal posts. O'Brien picked up the ball and ran back to Harvard's goal line, thinking he was making a touchback. The officials, though, ruled that on the kick-off O'Brien having carried the ball from the field of play to touch it behind goal posts, made the play a safety and gave Yale two points. Had he let the ball alone the play would have gone as a touchback. So the first quarter ended with the score, Harvard 3, Yale 2.

When the second period started, Knowles, from Yale's 8-yard line, punted to Mahan for a fair catch at Yale's 39-yard line. Harvard elected to try a placement kick. Logan held the ball and Brickley kicked. He kicked straight between the goal posts for a second goal from the field, making the score, Harvard 6, Yale 2.

When the teams lined up again Yale had the advantage of the wind and kicked off to Harvard. Guernsey booted the ball to Hardwick at the goal line and he ran it in to the sixteen-yard line, where Marting tackled him. Brickley gained two yards at the left guard. Mahan kicked on the first down against the wind to Ainsworth at Harvard's forty-seven-yard line, where O'Brien tackled him. Ainsworth was pulled up with a short turn by Storer. Guernsey went in behind his line on a shift play for a gain of three yards and was tackled by Trumbull. Guernsey tried a drop kick from the fifty-two-yard line, but the kick fell short and rolled over the goal line, and it was Harvard's ball at her own twenty-yard line.

Yale's Favorable Attack.

Marting broke through and got Mahan from behind. Manahan punted to Wilson at Yale's forty-yard line and he eluded the Harvard tacklers till he was forced outside at Harvard's thirty-four-yard line. For the first time Yale was in a favorable position to open her attack. Knowles took the ball on a delayed pass to Harvard's thirty-yard line. The Yale line was opening holes effectively. Knowles lost a yard at left tackle. On the next play Guernsey dropped back to the thirty-six-yard line and kicked a pretty goal from the field, making the score Harvard 6, Yale 5.

Brickley kicked for Harvard across the goal line and it was Yale's ball on her twenty-yard line. On the first down Wilson took the ball on a fake kick and made eight yards at right tackle. Knowles made a yard through the same place. Knowles punted to Mahan at Harvard's thirty-yard line and he was forced outside at the thirty-four-yard line. On a fake kick Brickley went through right tackle for nine yards, putting the ball on Harvard's forty-three-yard line. Bradlee made it first down at Harvard's forty-six-yard line with a plunge through the line. O'Brien came around right end for a gain of nine and was tackled by Avery. The play was repeated on the other of the line and Hardwick carried the ball to a first down on Yale's thirty-yard line.

Time was taken out for Knowles, who was slightly hurt in the tackle. Bettle replaced Bradlee in Harvard's backfield. Wilson carried the ball through the line for two yards. Ainsworth went around right end to the 33-yard line, where Brickley stopped him.

Guernsey dropped back to the 37-yard line and tried a drop kick, which went wide, with only a minute to play for the first half. Harvard put the ball in play at her 20-yard line. Brickley failed to gain against the Yale line, and before another play could be made time was called for the first half. Score: Harvard, 6; Yale, 5.

Neither team had been able to gain much through the other's rush line, and the only considerable advantage were made either in running back kicks or on plays outside of tackle.

In the second half Yale replaced Carter with "Red" Brann at right end. Harvard had no changes. Yale had the south goal, but the wind was less an advantage than in the first half. Brickley kicked off to Wilson at Yale's 7-yard line. He was thrown hard by Gilman at the 20-yard line. On the first play Knowles swept around left end behind splendid interference to Harvard's 38-yard line, where O'Brien tackled him.

Guernsey went through centre for 20 yards. Ainsworth tried right end, but Bettle threw him for a loss of two yards. Dana replaced O'Brien at left end for Harvard. Guernsey tried a drop kick from the 48-yard line, but the kick sailed too wide.

Another Goal for Harvard.

Dana went around right field for a gain of nearly 10 yards, which just failed of being a first down. With a half yard to go, Brickley plunged into the Yale line, which held like a stone wall, and he could not gain an inch, but Mahan made five yards at left tackle and come first down for Harvard. Bettle slipped through centre for a yard and Mahan added four more at right tackle. Brickley put the ball on the 27-yard line, and on the fourth down he dropped back and kicked another goal from the 36-yard line. The score was then: Harvard, 9; Yale, 5.

Brickley recovered a fumble by Logan with a loss of one yard. Time was taken out for Avery, Yale's left end, who was badly hurt in the last rush. McLeish took Avery's place. Mahan went through left tackle to the 20-yard line, where Knowles tackled him. On fourth down, Brickley dropped back and kicked another goal from the 30-yard line, making the score Harvard 12, Yale 5.

Scuich replaced Trumbull at centre for Harvard. Mahan made two yards at right tackle. Mahan punted to Wilson, who was downed by Dana, without any gain, on Yale's 37-yard line. Knowles hit the line without any gain, and Wilson was smothered in a plunge on Harvard's left wing. The third quarter ended with Yale holding the ball on the third down at her own 40-yard line.

Cowan replaced Hitchcock at left guard and Avery went back to his place at left end for Yale. Guernsey threw a forward pass to Knowles for a gain of ten yards, being forced outside by Soucy. The play gave Yale first down at her 48-yard line.

Guernsey threw a second forward pass across the line, which Brickley intercepted on Harvard's 30-yard line. Mahan lost four yards at right end, where Avery tackled him, but Brickley made up the four yards at left tackle.

After an exchange of kicks, Wilson made five yards at left end, giving Yale first down on her 25-yard line. Ainsworth went through right tackle for four yards. Wilson plunged through centre for five yards, but Yale was penalized fifteen yards for holding, putting the ball on Yale's 15-yard line. Knowles punted out of danger.

Mahan made it first down on Yale's 29-yard line. Brickley made four yards at left tackle, where Warren stopped him. Brickley struggled through centre to the 20-yard line. With half a yard to go for a first down, Brickley went through to Yale's 17-yard line.

Easy Goal for Brickley.

Yale rushed Arnold in for Pendleton on the line. Mahan was stopped without a gain. Knowles hurt his knee in stopping the rush and Yale took time out while McLeish came back to replace him. Brickley dropped back as if for a drop-kick, but Mahan took the ball to the 12-yard line. Brickley added a yard at left tackle. On fourth down, with three yards to go, Brickley dropped back and kicked an easy goal from the 21-yard line, making the score Harvard 15, Yale 5.

Guernsey kicked off for Yale to Bettle, who ran the back in from the 20-yard line to the 34-yard line. Timo was taken out for Cowen. Mahan kicked out of bounds at Yale's 43-yard line. Guernsey tried a forward pass, which Brickley knocked down. Another forward pass by Guernsey was intercepted by Brickley, who was tackled by Avery at Harvard's 41-yard line.

There was another exchange of kicks, and Guernsey kicked to Mahan who made a fair catch at Yale's 45-yard line, where Brickley tried a kick from placement. He failed to score and it was Yale's ball on her 20-yard line and thus ended the greatest football struggle ever seen on Soldiers Field. The line-up:

Harvard.	Position.	Yale.
O'Brien	Left end	Avery
Gilman	Left guard	Ketcham
Trumbull	Centre	Marting
Pennock	Right guard	Pendleton
Storer	Right tackle	Warren

YALE MAY ELECT TALBOTT.

Only Four of This Year's Team Will Return Next Season.

Special to The New York Times.

NEW HAVEN, Conn., Nov. 22.—Capt. Henry Ketcham of the Yale football eleven said to-day that, although he wishes to hold the election for a Captain for next season as soon as possible, the call will not be issued for several days. The players will not vote upon the matter until after they return from their Thanksgiving holiday.

Nelson Talbott is the logical and almost the certain Captain, as far as indications at present go. He is the only player who has been for two seasons a regular, and his work this Fall has been of the all-American variety. His home is in Dayton, and he prepared for Yale at the Hotchkis School, Lakeville, Conn., where Capt. Arthur Howe and Capt. Henry Ketcham also received their prep school education. Talbott's work at left tackle has been of the gilt-edge variety this Fall.

Yale faces a thorough reorganization of its football eleven before another season because of the graduation of most of the members of the present team, but a permanent system of coaching has been established by the engagement of Howard Jones as resident coach for several years, and it is now likely that Dr. Billy Bull will be continued as coach of the punters another season.

Of the regulars of this year's eleven, only Talbott, Carter, Wilson, and Knowles will return another season. Of the substitutes, Guernsey, Cornell, Brann, Loughridge, Wiser, and MacLeish will be again in college. The rush line another season will be almost entirely new, but there will be strong back field material.

Financially, the season that closed to-day was Yale's best in the history of the gridiron. The Harvard game to-day netted about $44,000, the Princeton game about $33,000, the Brown game $5,000, and the minor matches about $5,000 more, a total of more than $80,000 being realized for the first time. Next year the receipts will be even larger, because of the presence of the new "Bowl" at Yale Field. This will change the total seating capacity at Yale from about 34,000 to more than 60,000, and will add about $25,000 to Yale's total receipts for future seasons.

Yale Admits Harvard's Superiority.

Special to The New York Times.

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Nov. 22.—Yale players and Capt. Ketcham declined to-night to comment on the game. Head Coach Jones proclaimed Harvard as entitled to full honors as the American intercollegiate champions. Head Coach Percy Haughton of Harvard called at the Yale dressing rooms after the game, and extended his hand to Jones, asking him to accept and to convey to Capt. Ketcham of Yale the Harvard appreciation of the sportsmanlike quality of the game. Coach Jones warmly congratulated Haughton on the success of the season's work, saying to him: "Harvard has a fine team in every respect."

Harvard Club of Paris Celebrates.

PARIS, Nov. 22.—While the Harvard Club of Paris was having its annual dinner to-night news of Harvard's victory over Yale at the Cambridge Stadium was received, and for several minutes there was enthusiastic cheering. M. Bernard, President, was at the dinner, and the guests included American Ambassador Myron T. Herrick.

NEW HAVEN ELECTRIC TIE-UP

Grounded Wire Paralyzes Main Line and Subsidiaries Near Stamford.

Special to The New York Times.

STAMFORD, Conn., Nov. 22.—From 8:54 until 9:42 o'clock this morning traffic on the New Haven Railroad between Stamford and New York and on the New York & Westchester Railroad throughout its length was paralyzed by the grounding of the feed wire of the company, which gets its power from the power house at Cos Cob.

The accident also tied up electric traffic in Stamford until 3:40 P. M., not a wheel moving for almost seven hours.

Between 8:54 and 11 o'clock not a street car moved between Norwalk and New Rochelle. At about 11 o'clock a temporary connection was made between the feed lines of the Westchester Street Railroad Company and the Stamford & New York Road at Mamaroneck, and street cars were run intermittently between Port Chester and New Rochelle until the trouble at Cos Cob was repaired.

General Manager Bardo and Electric Supt. Wildin hurried from New Haven to the power house on a special train and, with Hoge Gilliam, Superintendent of Electric Lines, remained there until late this afternoon.

The accident puzzled the railroad experts. What happened was this: A short circuit blew out a circuit breaker outside the power house, and the trouble, in some manner puzzling to the investigators, got inside the power house and blew out every circuit breaker in the place, burning out one. It was necessary to rewire all the circuit breakers, and the fact that the New Haven Road and the New York & Westchester were held up only an hour was because their feed lines are single-phase, while the Connecticut Company's feed lines are three-phase.

WOULD ENJOIN FORESTERS.

Member of the Order Carries Increased Assessment to Federal Court

Special to The New York Times.

BUFFALO, Nov. 22.—A suit to enjoin the Supreme Court of the Independent Order of Foresters from doing any further business in this State was filed to-day in the United States District Court. The plaintiff is Orrin P. Stockwell of Attica, and his complaint is remarkable for its length and for the vigor of the language in which the defendant is denounced.

The plaintiff says that he became a member of the order in July, 1892, being a $3,000 beneficiary. At the time, he says, the dues were 84 cents per $1,000 per month. In July, 1908, the dues were increased by the Supreme Court in session in Toronto to $1.91 per $1,000, the plaintiff alleges. An injunction to prevent the levying of this increased rate was obtained in this State and was fought up to the Court of Appeals, being finally vacated.

In August of this year, he continues, the defendant in session in Toronto voted to assess against the plaintiff the sum of $280 per $1,000, in addition to the increased rate, this to be deducted from his benefits. He terms this action a "gross and iniquitous fraud."

The plaintiff charges that the defendant's sole reason for increasing the rates was so that it could use them for personal ends. Charges of waste are made, and it is claimed that instead of putting the order on a "sound actuarial basis" the increase would simply "put off the day of reckoning." It is further alleged that, by reason of the increase in rates, thousands of members have let their policies lapse. A surplus of at least $13,000,000 should be on hand to pay the benefits, it is said.

The plaintiff asks that the defendant's officers and agents be compelled to make an accounting of the funds, that it be enjoined from charging other than the regular rates, that it be enjoined and prohibited from doing further insurance business in this State, and that the defendant in this State be declared insolvent and a receiver appointed.

JERSEY FRANCHISE TAX.

Public Service Corporation to Pay $990,214.

Special to The New York Times.

TRENTON, N. J., Nov. 22.—Records of the State Board of Assessors show that of the total tax of $1,377,901 to be paid to the various municipalities under the Voorhees Franchise act, 71.86 per cent. will be paid by the Public Service Corporation and its subsidiaries.

It will pay a total of $990,214, divided in this way: Street railway companies, $686,483; electric light companies, $136,408; gas companies, $167,323.

DEMANDS $500,000 FOR LOVE HE LOST

Telamon Cuyler Sues His Rich Mother-in-Law, Following His Wife's Divorce.

THEY ARE IN CALIFORNIA

Cuyler, Whose Name Used to be Smith, Well Known in Atlanta—Wife Was Miss Grace T. Barton.

Mrs. Isabella Barton, a wealthy resident of Alameda, Cal., was sued yesterday by her son-in-law, Telamon Cuyler, for $500,000 damages for alienation of the affections of his wife. The complaint adds accusations against Mrs. Barton of having sworn at the plaintiff without cause and of assaulting him in the presence of his wife. Mr. Cuyler says that Mrs. Barton threatened to disinherit her daughter unless she deserted him, and that she also forced his wife to decide between her mother and him, and that, yielding to these threats, his wife decided to cleave to her mother.

Mr. Cuyler was a lawyer in Atlanta, Ga., when he met Miss Grace T. Barton, and there they were married on Nov. 14, 1900. Mr. Cuyler says he continued the practice of law for two years, and that he then gave up his career at the solicitation of his wife and moved with her to this city. He says his wife deserted him in March, 1912, and went to her mother's home in Alameda. There an action for divorce was begun and a decree granted to Mrs. Cuyler. Mr. Cuyler says no summons in this proceeding was ever served upon him. The two children of the couple, a boy of 4 and a girl of 11, live with the mother.

Earle & Russell of 165 Broadway are the attorneys for Mr. Cuyler.

Special to The New York Times.

SAN FRANCISCO, Nov. 22.—Emphatic denial that she had in any way exerted influence to cause her daughter to seek a divorce was made at her home in Alameda to-night by Mrs. Isabella Barton, widow of the wealthy pioneer, John Barton, who has been sued in New York by her son-in-law, Telamon Cuyler, for $500,000 for alleged alienation of his wife's affections.

"I have not been served in a suit of this nature," said Mrs. Barton, "and all I know of it was gleaned from dispatches from the East. However, I wish to deny most emphatically the truth of the charges Mr. Cuyler is said to have made. I have at no time attempted to alienate my daughter's affections. She divorced her husband simply because he failed to support her and the two children."

Mrs. Cuyler, who is residing at the family home at 2,527 Central Avenue, Alameda, corroborated her mother's statements.

Prior to her marriage to Cuyler in 1900, Mrs. Cuyler was a leader in Alameda society. She was married at the Waldorf-Astoria in New York City. For eight years she lived with Mr. Cuyler, who, she says, represented himself to be wealthy, the scion of a rich family of cotton planters of Atlanta.

Special to The New York Times.

ATLANTA, Nov. 22.—Telamon Cuyler, who has filed suit in New York to-day for $500,000 against the mother of his former wife, is one of Atlanta's best known characters. He is a son of the late H. H. Smith, a wealthy cotton factor. While still known as Telamon Smith he met Miss Barton of California in New York and paid assiduous court to her. It was published that Miss Barton objected to changing her name to Smith, so Telamon Smith examined his family tree and found that he was descended from the Cuyler family of New York. He returned to Atlanta and induced the Georgia Legislature to change his name to Telamon Cuyler. Then he went to New York and made Miss Barton Mrs. Telamon Cuyler.

Cuyler and his bride, accompanied by her mother, went to Europe and spent some years there. When they returned to the United States Mrs. Cuyler and her mother went to California and Cuyler returned to Atlanta. Soon afterward Mrs. Cuyler sued for divorce, alleging non-support. A few months ago Mrs. Cuyler won the divorce and received the custody of the two children.

Cuyler has told Atlanta friends that Mrs. Barton induced her daughter to sue for the divorce and that his mother-in-law caused all his domestic troubles.

Cuyler has received much publicity in the Atlanta papers on account of his eccentricities. He was once very bizarre in his dress. He was the first man to appear on the streets of Atlanta in a shirt-waist.

BARRED FROM MERRITT HOME

Receiver Unable to Take an Inventory of Supervisor's Effects.

Special to The New York Times.

MOUNT VERNON, N. Y., Nov. 22.—A second unsuccessful attempt was made to-day by B. M. Freeman, receiver for Supervisor Henry C. Merritt of Eastchester, who has been missing several weeks, to enter Mr. Merritt's home today.

Mr. Freeman got no further than the vestibule. Henry C. Merritt, Jr., son of the missing Supervisor, barred Mr. Freeman's progress and threatened him with bodily harm if he tried to force his way further. The receiver desired to take an inventory of Mr. Merritt's effects.

STRIKE TALK IN 50 MILLS.

Paterson Threatened with Another Invasion of I. W. W. Leaders.

Special to The New York Times.

PATERSON, N. J., Nov. 22.—Over fifty mills held shop meetings to-day and indorsed the action of the ribbon weavers, 1,500 of whom demanded nine hours' work with a strike alternative at the I. W. W. mass meeting last night.

At the shops' meetings committees drew up the demands which will be presented on Monday morning at 9 o'clock. They ask that the manufacturers give them nine hours the year round and that an answer be delivered by 9 o'clock the following Monday morning, Dec. 1. If the answer is not forthcoming or is not favorable, the weavers will march out in a body and proceed to the I. W. W. headquarters for a mass meeting, when I. W. W. leaders will speak.

Patrick Quinlan has been in Paterson for two or three weeks busily engaged with local I. W. W. leaders. Though he has not as yet come out as leader and agitator in the movement, it is said he will do so.

Miss Elizabeth Gurley Flynn, another agitator, visited Paterson a week ago and lectured on soildarity to the women weavers.

In the Johnson Cowdin Mill, where 175 weavers walked out on Friday because the Superintendent would not discharge a worker who didn't belong to the I. W. W., nothing was done today, and nearly 450 employes were idle. The Ribbon Manufacturers' Association has passed resolutions indorsing the stand of the Johnson Mill, and stating they would back it.

If the 4,000 or 5,000 ribbon weavers in the city strike on Dec. 1, over 12,000 ribbon mill workers will be thrown on the streets. The weavers say this will be a fight to a finish this time. Ewald Koetgen, I. W. W. leader, at the head of the strike movement, said to-night:

"If the manufacturers don't come across, Haywood, Tresca, Flynn, Quinlan, and Mann will be called to Paterson to take charge, and we will put up a real fight this time."

ELECTRIC STRIKE HALTS.

Schenectady Workers Don't Quit on Account of Discharged Leaders.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y., Nov. 22.—The 12,000 union men and women in the General Electric Works did not walk out this morning as had been expected.

Representatives of the unions conferred with James A. Smith, General Superintendent, in the hope of an amicable agreement, but the workers are pessimistic of this outcome.

The plan was for the unions' representatives to demand the reinstatement of Frank Dujay and Miss Mabel Leslie within two days. The unionists maintained that the discharge of their two leaders was part of a general plan to do away with union workers. This allegation was denied by officials of the company.

Supt. Smith said there was no immediate possibility of a strike.

The two representatives of the State Labor Department, William C. Roger and P. J. Downey, returned to Albany to-day. They arranged the meeting between Smith and representatives of the union. Mr. Rogers also thought a strike would be averted.

HUNT TO SHUT SALOONS.

Will Use Every Policeman, Says Cincinnati Mayor—Denounces Law.

Special to The New York Times.

CINCINNATI, Nov. 22.—Henry T. Hunt, Mayor of Cincinnati, who has described the new State liquor license law as an outrage and said he would support the ousted saloonkeepers in their attack on the measure, announced today that he would use the entire police force if necessary to close unlicensed saloons on Monday, when the new law becomes effective. The Mayor promises protection to 57 saloon keepers until a case now in the court is decided.

The State Board says that such a course shall not be pursued, that the licenses were withdrawn for sufficient reasons, that the saloon keepers who attempt to operate without licenses are violating the law as much as those who never had licenses, and that the places will be closed.

State secret agents will be sent to Cincinnati and other big cities by the State Board. One member of the board says removal of city officials who do not enforce the law is not improbable. Another member says the State and County license law does not go into effect until midnight Sunday.

Some saloons closed at midnight, and will not open to-morrow. As the closing time approached solemn scenes were enacted. A grave situation faces not only many saloon keepers, but also their employes, who know no other trade than that of mixing drinks. For the first time there were bargain sales in the saloons, and many citizens hied homeward carrying a demijohn of their favorite brew, bought at ridiculously low prices.

In all nearly 3,000 saloons in Ohio will go out of business with Sunday midnight.

INCORPORATES THE POLICE.

Irvington Department to Have a School and Identification Bureau.

WHITE PLAINS, N. Y., Nov. 22.—M. S. Beltzhoover, President of Irvington, whose place, Sunnyside, is one of the show places of the village, and who is one of the ten so-called millionaire Deputy Sheriffs of Westchester County, has incorporated the police officers of the county in an organization known as the Police Association of Westchester County. The chief features of the association will be a school of instruction and a bureau for the identification of criminals. The active membership will be police officials above the rank of Lieutenant.

Sheriff William J. Doyle is cooperating with Mr. Beltzhoover in launching the bureau for the identification of criminals. A "central" office has been opened in the Marion Building, opposite the County Jail.

MRS. G. A. THOMPSON MUST PAY DUTIES

Customs Officials Win Case Against the Former Miss May Van Alen.

HELD TO BE A RESIDENT

Her Marriage to American Destroyed Claim to Exemption by Long Absence from This Country.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 22.—Announcement was made at the Treasury Department to-day that a final decision had been rendered in the case of Mrs. May Van Alen Thompson, wife of Griswold A. Thompson of New York, and a daughter of James A. Van Alen of Newport. She denied on the ground of non-residence the right of the Government to collect any duty on pearls, jewels, and other effects which she recently brought into this country, and which were detained by the Boston customs officials because of her alleged failure to declare the same.

Assistant Secretary Hamlin of the Treasury Department, on Oct. 24 last, announced that it had been tentatively decided to levy the full amount of duty on such of her effects as were bought abroad, and this was done. Effects worth about $40,000 were admitted free of duty because they were of American origin.

It was announced to-day that the department had ordered the permanent liquidation of the duties on these foreign articles. This means that Mrs. Thompson is regarded by the American Government as a resident of the United States because of her recent marriage in London to Mr. Thompson, an American. Mrs. Thompson before her marriage had lived abroad long enough to have become a non-resident of the United States. As such, prior to her marriage, she would have been entitled to free entry of her effects.

From this decision Mrs. Thompson has the right to appeal to the Board of Special Assessors, and after that to the United States Customs Court.

To Sell $950,000 Hollins Notes.

Judge Hough authorized A. Leo Everett, receiver for H. B. Hollins & Co., to assent to the sale by the Chase National Bank to Crossman & Sielcken of four stock notes, amounting to $950,000, of the bankrupt firm, yesterday. When the sale has been made the purchaser is to receive the collateral security, which consists of corporate stock of the City of New York, bonds of the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Company, and fifty shares of the Northern Pacific aRllway Company, which have an aggregate par value of $1,181,375.

VILLA DYNAMITES TWO FEDERAL TRAINS

Rebel Commander Says He Caused Enormous Loss of Life.

ENEMY NUMBERED 1,500

Were Advancing to Attack Juarez, When Constitutionalists Went Out to Meet Them.

EL PASO, Texas, Nov. 22.—Two Federal troop trains, en route from Chihuahua to Juarez, were blown up at Rancheria, sixty-six miles south of Juarez, this afternoon by dynamite mines placed along the railroad track by the rebels. This was the statement given out to-night by Gen. Francisco Villa, who returned to Juarez from that place, where his troops are awaiting the Federals' approach. He said there were 1,500 Federals on the train destroyed and that the loss of life was enormous. The rebels assert that they captured one of the two trains.

Villa returned to Juarez, fearing that the Federals had dispatched a flanking column to Guadalupe, a border town east of Juarez, with the intention of sending this force to Juarez to attack the town. Scouting parties went from Juarez this afternoon to watch for the approach of the Federal troops.

The main body of Gen. Villa's forces is reported to-night to be about forty miles south of the border; but so far the impending battle between the two armies has not been opened. At rebel headquarters in Juarez it was reported to-night that a few shots were exchanged by the advance guard of the two armies late this afternoon, but both sides retired, awaiting the bringing up of the main bodies of troops.

BLAMES US FOR MEXICO.

Prince Poniatowski Says Our Policy Has Been Destructive.

Prince Andre Poniatowski, who arrived yesterday on the steamship France from Paris, said that the opinion abroad on the attitude of the United States toward Mexico was that President Wilson must hold some cards up his sleeve or be holding back some inside information.

"If this is not the case," said the French financier, "then, as surface conditions go, his attitude is unsatisfactory. People think that if he hasn't anything to go upon President Wilson is putting the United States in a bad light abroad as well as in South America. The opinion in Europe is that since he has gone so far in the Mexican matter the President ought to be given a free hand to see what he can do.

"The United States," Prince Poniatowsky went on to say, "has a mistaken idea of dollar diplomacy in thinking it consists of protecting the big interests and not the individual. In most cases the reverse is true in Europe, and money is a secondary consideration.

"Wittingly or unwittingly, the United States has given strength to the rebellion in Mexico. The United States should maintain its self-respect. All the President has done up to the present has been to plant the American flag down under the noses of the Mexicans and tell them that there is no fear of a protectorate, and all he has done for Americans in that country is to tell them to run away. Americans in Mexico now find it hard to get employment, as an American staff means trouble because of the stand of the United States Government. I have interests in South America, and cannot employ American engineers because the natives dislike them.

"There has been no mention of a successor to Huerta in all the dictatorial mandates sent out from Washington. All that has been done has tended to pull down and destroy Mexican institutions, and this has been the attitude of Presidents of the United States for the last ten years.

"Three months ago Huerta, or any other man who was strong enough, should have been left alone in the saddle to establish a policy of peace, and pressure should have been brought to bear to show what the United States wanted done in Mexico, instead of letting everything be torn down and destroyed.

"The policy of the United States is destructive. Roosevelt had luck, but Taft did not have any. Perhaps Wilson may have luck. If so, it may pull him out of the hole he has got into over the Mexican situation."

Ernesto Madero, a brother of the late President Francisco Madero, was also a passenger on the France with his wife. He said:

"I have been away for a long time and I do not know anything about actual conditions in Mexico, so I cannot talk of them. I have nothing to say."

CARRANZA GIVES A BALL.

Entertains Townspeople of Magdalens—Disowns Lee Christmas.

MAGDALENA, Sonora, Nov. 22.—With a hard campaign along the west coast awaiting him, Gen. Venustiano Carranza, the Mexican Constitutionalist chief, to-day prolonged his stay in this town, the centre of an agricultural district, apparently unconcerned with either military or diplomatic affairs.

To-night he gave a ball for the townspeople and officers of his staff. The train from Hermosillo to-day brought the Sonora State Band and a party of officers from the State Capital to participate in the ball and in other social affairs which will take place here to-morrow.

Although Gen. Carranza announced before leaving Nogales that he would repay a social debt here, it was said by members of his party that possibly his prolonged stay was due to other reasons. He has been in close touch by telegraph with the situation both in the interior of Mexico and in the United States.

From the south it was reported that Gen. Ojeda's Federale had again attempted a sortie from Guaymaa. Two Federal columns which assaulted the rebel fronts at Maytorena and Cruz de Piedra, north and south of the Guiaport, have been driven back, it is said.

Absolute denial was made to-day at the temporary Constitutionalist headquarters that the reported activity of Lee Christmas, the American soldier of fortune, in recruiting Americans in Chicago had any connection with the Constitutionalist movement in Mexico. It was reiterated that neither Gen. Carranza nor his advisers would permit any foreigners to join the insurgent troops, an attitude which has thus far characterized the leaders of the present revolution.

The arrival to-day of Ignacio Bonillas, Secretary of the Interior in Carranza's Provisional Government, completed, with one exception, the Constitutionalist Cabinet present here. Francisco Escudero, who, as Secretary of Foreign Relations, was Carranza's representative in the recent negotiations with the American Government agent, Dr. William Bayard Hale, remained in Nogales. It was said the entire party planned to leave to-morrow for Hermosillo, and after a brief stay at the State capital continue southward to engage in the projected campaigning in Sinaloa.

HUERTA GAVE ORDER TO FIRE ON EL PASO

Instructed Juarez Commander to Turn Guns on That City if Rebels Attacked Him.

MILLS BUILDING A TARGET

Dr. Thatcher Says He Sought Thus to Force Intervention and Unite Mexico Behind Him.

Dr. Frank Thatcher, formerly city chemist and bacteriologist of El Paso, Texas, and an officer in the Mexican revolutionary army under Francisco Madero, arrived yesterday at the Imperial direct from the Mexican border. Dr. Thatcher says he saw as much of the taking of Juarez a week ago yesterday morning as anybody in El Paso, and the accounts of "eye-witnesses" he read on the way up put him in such a state of indignation that by the time he got here he thought people ought to know what there really was in the stories of wholesale executions there.

"People down our way, the thoughtful ones," Dr. Thatcher said yesterday, "believe that intervention by this Government would have the effect of uniting all factions in Mexico against us. There is good evidence in El Paso that Huerta had given instructions to his commander at Juarez that if he found himself attacked by the Insurrectos he should take a few shots at the Mills building in El Paso, on the supposition that this would bring about intervention. One thing is certain, if the United States ever intervenes in Mexico it will have to fight every man, woman, and child in the country. It would require three years to subdue and pacify the country, and we could count upon a loss of 100,000 men, and I don't know how many million dollars."

Dr. Thatcher was particularly incensed when he saw displayed on Broadway a photograph purporting to picture some of those executions. He said it was absolutely impossible for anybody to see from El Paso what was going on in Juarez, because not only were Gen. Villa's operations screened from residents of El Paso by a mile and a half of brick, stone, and adobe buildings, but that the place where the revolutionists' train stopped was fully two and a half miles from El Paso.

For another thing, the battle began at 2:10 A. M., and the main fighting was over by 5 o'clock. Dr. Thatcher himself was up during that time trying to see what was going on, but though he found as good a post of observation as was to be had north of the river, he couldn't see anything but the flashes of the guns.

"But I was one of the few that managed to get across after the first fight, and that was when the second took place," said Dr. Thatcher yesterday. "It was about 7:30 o'clock when I crossed the bridge. Villa was then about to move against the 120 Federal volunteers who had taken a position back of the concrete grand stand at the race track.

"I thought he might shell the place, and this would have ruined a lot of American propery, have killed a lot of the 300 horses stabled there, and undoubtedly would have been pretty serious for the Americans who were looking after them. I sent a friend to interview Villa, and the latter said that the only way to get the Federals out was to shell the grandstand. When it was pointed out what might be the other results, he decided to enfilade both sides of the track with machine guns. In the fight that ensued, Villa lost fourteen men. Had he shelled the place, as he originally intended, he would have got off without the loss of a man.

"As for the executions that took place, there were only four men shot. One, Padilla, a Colonel of volunteers, was executed as a traitor. He had been a Captain in the Madero revolution, and when Orozco turned upon Madero he joined with Villa and then deserted to the Federals. Another, a Lieutenant of artillery, had been captured by Villa in the fight at Parral. He turned insurrecto, and then went back to the Federals. I know positively that only two other men were executed by Villa.

"Anyhow, the Federals started by killing everybody. I have witnessed Federal executions, and they don't carry them out with a squad of men. They simply stand the condemned up in a row, one behind another, and one man stands near the foremost and shoots through the lot with a Mauser rifle.

"The one American killed in Juarez during the fight was the driver of a public automobile. He was waiting for a load of late fares. The rebels came up one end of the street where his car was standing, and the Federals approached from the other end. Both forces had machine guns, and Seggerson was caught between the two fires. I don't think he was seen by either side. There was no electric light on at the time. Villa sent $500 to the widow and gave his guarantee that when the Constitutionalists got in she would get damages."

Baptists Indorse Wilson Policy.

LYNCHBURG, Va., Nov. 22.—Approval of the policy of President Wilson with reference to the Mexican situation was expressed in resolutions adopted here to-day by the Baptist General Association of Virginia. The association also expressed its belief that the future policy of the Administration would be along Christian lines. Prayer was offered for the divine guidance of President Wilson and his Cabinet.

ALLEGED "ELECTION ORDERS."

Huerta Instructions to Nullify Balloting Thought Not Authentic.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

MEXICO CITY, Nov. 22.—A document purporting to be a copy of explicit instructions sent out by the Huerta Government to election officers throughout the republic and aiming to insure that the recent election should be invalidated, is in circulation here in political circles.

One copy of these instructions which was sent to Gen. Joaquin Maass, Governor of the State of Puebla, for transmission to the district officials, ordered that all municipal Presidents, known to be in sympathy with the revolution, should be removed before election day; that all the election officers should be trustworthy; that at least two-thirds of the polling booths should be closed (thus making a legal choice impossible,) and that blank ballots should be provided so that an absolute majority of the votes cast should be given to Huerta and Blanquet.

THE TIMES correspondent has had a copy of this document for some time, but has been unable to establish its authenticity. The copy which is generally exhibited here, but secretly, comes from partisans of Gen. Felix Diaz, and is consequently regarded as not absolutely reliable.

The American Embassy here has a copy, but it is understood that Nelson O'Shaughnessy, the Chargé, has informed the State Department that he is unable to guarantee that it is authentic.

A prominent politician here said that, while the alleged instructions tally in many respects with the manner in which the elections were held, it was highly improbable that any such instructions should have been put into writing, since it is known that Victor Manuel Corral made a tour of the States, giving instructions to the Governors similar to those contained in the alleged document. It is known that Corral called upon Gen. Maass, to whom instructions are alleged to have been issued.

Another copy of the document ordered that not two-thirds, but one more than half of the polling places should remain closed, and added that the voters were to be allowed to vote as they pleased, blank ballots being used to insure that most of the votes were cast for Huerta and Blanquet.

MAY TELL ABOUT COCAINE.

Bourden, Now Under Arrest, Expected to Implicate Others.

A confession implicating some of the biggest cocaine dealers in New York is expected by Assistant District Attorney Wilmot from William Bourden, 33 years old, of 105 East 114th Street, who was arrested on Friday night by Detective Edwin Leigh of the District Attorney's office, on a charge of having cocaine in his possession. Bourden was held in $1,500 bail yesterday by Magistrate Breen in the Tombs Court.

Bourden was arrested through District Attorney Whitman's crusade against cocaine distributors. For some time past Mr. Wilmot, who has been in charge of the investigation, has been questioning prisoners in the Tombs and a number of them named Bourden as the man who furnished them with the drug.

On Friday Samuel Deane, a process server in the District Attorney's office, went to Bourden's place and bought a small box of cocaine. The detectives then raided the place and arrested Bourden. If his confession is obtained a number of important arrests will follow, according to Mr. Wilmot.

RESCUE IN THE SUBWAY.

One Man Leaps to the Tracks, Another Flags Incoming Train.

When John Linehan of 377 Brook Avenue, The Bronx, fell to the uptown express tracks from the platform of the Brooklyn Bridge subway at 11 o'clock last night, two witnesses of his fall acted so quickly that his life was saved.

Gus Whiting of 143 Wadsworth Avenue raced to the end of the platform to flag the incoming train, while Gerald Galway of 252 West Twelfth Street jumped to the track bed and drew Mr. Linehan from the dangerous proximity of the third rail. The motorman of the approaching train, who had sighted the warning from the platform, was able to bring his wheels to a stop within a few feet of the man on the tracks and his rescuer.

Mr. Linehan, who is 60 years old, was taken to the Hudson Street Hospital suffering from bruises on the face.

READS PENROSE OUT OF THE SENATE RACE

J. D. O'Neil, Former Adherent, Says It Will Be Futile to Seek Renomination.

CURTIS BOOMED FOR PLACE

Philadelphia Publisher Picked as the Most Likely Candidate—Can Have Organization Indorsement.

Special to The New York Times.

PITTSBURGH, Nov. 22.—"Determined and outspoken opposition to his candidacy within the ranks of the Republican Party in the State has at last forced United States Senator Boies E. Penrose to realize the futility of his seeking a renomination at the 1914 primary," said County Commissioner J. Denny O'Neil to-night. Mr. O'Neil, formerly a strong Oliver-Penrose adherent and a political power in Western Pennsylvania politics, had just returned from Philadelphia, where he spent several days in conference with the leading Republican and Progressive Party politicians, when he made the foregoing statement this evening.

"The choice has narrowed down to one of three prominent Eastern men," said Mr. O'Neil, "and the most likely candidate appears to be Cyrus K. Curtis, publisher of The Saturday Evening Post and The Philadelphia Ledger. Mr. Curtis will undoubtedly have the backing of the best element in the Republican Party, and if he stands for the nomination will poll a large vote. The other most likely candidates are former Gov. Edwin S. Stuart and Senator William Sproul of Delaware County.

"There is no doubt that Mr. Curtis can have the indorsement of the State Republican machine if he wants it, and, as it now stands, he is the most likely man to head the Republican ticket for United States Senator at the primary next year. If Senator Penrose attempts to come back he will be buried under a deluge."

PUPILS REFUSE TO SING.

Objection to Hymns Folows Strike Against Vaccination.

The school authorities who preside over the destinies of Public School 72, at Schneck Avenue and New Lots Road, East New York, are puzzled as to just what they ought to do about a combative spirit showing itself among the pupils. It has shown itself in many ways of late, particularly in the matter of vaccination and in the matter of morning devotional exercises.

Recently a whole block of the children held out against the administering of vaccine, and a majority of the school is silently on record against the singing of such music as "The Battle Hymn of the Republic" and "St. George's Chapel." The objection to these hymns was made known by a silence overhanging the morning assemblies. It was understood at once that these children, fully 95 per cent. of them from Jewish homes, were objecting on matters of faith, and Principal Murphy favored leaving the debatable hymns from the programmes. But interviews with the children brought to light the fact that in many cases objection was not to the religion of the hymns, but to their lack of scientific basis. There is a sturdy movement of adolescent agnosticism in the ranks of the children at Public School 72.

Many of the children, however, devout in the Jewish faith, object to the hymns from a religious viewpoint, and they, too, have helped maintain the silence.

District Supt. Lyon and Principal Murphy are both strongly minded to let the children have their way in these things and very strongly disinclined to set any example of intolerance.

PISTOL BARKS IN CHASE.

Detective Takes One Suspect from Under Couch in Apartment.

In pursuit of one of four men whom the police found loitering suspiciously at 11 o'clock last night in front of a building in West Twenty-sixth Street, Detective Dennison ran down Seventh Avenue as far as Twenty-first Street, punctuating his chase by frequent shots from his revolver. He wheeled into Twenty-first Street in time to see his man vanish into the entrance of the Hillington apartments at 234.

There was uproar in the lobby of the building when the flourishing revolver of the detectives appeared in the doorway and demanded loudly the whereabouts of the man who had just come in. The stranger had taken the elevator to the third floor. The elevator returned and Dennison went up on it. At the third floor Mrs. Margaret Murphy was shrieking that a burglar had come in to her rooms. There was a search and under the couch Dennison found a breathless stranger whom he arrested.

In the West Seventeenth Street Station, the prisoner said he was Martin Pfeifer of 419 Ninth Avenue. He was locked up as a suspicious person, together with two other prisoners, arrested by other detectives.

The police had been warned that something was to be "pulled off." In succeeded in driving back the attacking party after a short struggle in which two men were killed and several wounded. The foreign residents, however, felt that this protection was insufficient, said Dr. Rehue, and all were planning to leave soon.

Four French citizens, he said, were taken prisoners by the insurgents and beaten almost to death. The hatred of the French in Santa Rosalia, he said, was due to a large French mining company having given food and water to the Federal troops during the siege of Guaymas.

HELD FOR AMMUNITION THEFT

Three Negro Cavalrymen and Three Mexicans Arrested.

DOUGLAS, Ariz., Nov. 22.—As a result of the recent theft of 3,200 rounds of ammunition from Troop L, Ninth United States Cavalry, (negro,) six arrests have been made, and it is said that thirty more are in prospect.

Three soldiers and three Mexicans were arrested, charged with grand larceny and conspiracy to smuggle munitions of war from the United States into Mexico. The soldiers, Sergt. Sheppard and Privates George Washington and William Johnson, were also charged with having sold Government ammunition, an offense carrying a heavy penalty.

The Mexicans taken into custody all drive automobiles which ply between Douglas and Agua Prieta, Sonora.

FINGER-PRINT TEST UPHELD.

Prisoner Admits He Had Missing Digit Cut Off.

When four men charged with burglary were taken to Police Headquarters yesterday morning, the police felt sure they had captured four professionals, and their confidence was supported by the finger-print records, save in the case of Joseph Sniple of 145 Madison Street. The prints of the thumb and four fingers of the left hand were the same as those of a man who had served a term for burglary in Elmira, but this previous offender had an extra finger and the man arrested yesterday had not. Still sure of the infallibility of their system, the police examined that left hand closely, with the result that they came upon a small scar, and finally extracted from their prisoner the confession that he had had his tell-tale finger cut off since his Elmira days.

The four arrests were made at three different times at the entrance to the cellar of the house at 170 East Fourth Street, where the police had been told, they would find a cache of stolen goods. Detectives watched the place, and when two men were seen uniocking the padlock on the door they were arrested. Returned from headquarters, the police had not been watching long before Sniple appeared with a key to that padlock. They had no sooner taken him in custody when the fourth man, well dressed and innocent looking, came up to the marked door.

The other three prisoners said they were Nathan Goldman of 640 Washington Avenue, Isidor Goldstein of 26 Lewis Street, and Samuel Cohen of 105 Henry Street. The police say all three have been convicted of burglary, and that Goldman and Goldstein had done long terms in Sing Sing for the offense. It is the police theory that the latter two represented one gang and Sniple and Cohen a rival gang, and that the scramble for possession of the hidden goods was a war of these gangs. The goods in qustion were some $2,000 worth of bristles for brushes.

Dies While Walking with Wife.

While walking with his wife in Amsterdam Avenue last night, Walter W. Crawford, 57 years old, a lithographer, of 107 West Eighty-eighth Street, complained of feeling ill and as he neared Ninety-second Street sank to the pavement. Dr. De Passe of the Polyclinic Hospital was called and said the man was dead.

THREE FEDERAL JOBS FOR WILSON TO FILL

Two Already Exist in the Interstate Commerce Commission, One to Come.

MAY RETAIN CLEMENTS

Gov. Glenn of North Carolina a Candidate—Two New Yorkers Also in the Field.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 22. — The death of John H. Marble gives President Wilson three vacancies to fill on the Interstate Commerce Commission. The term of Judson C. Clements is about to expire, while Commissioner Charles A. Prouty's resignation, so that he may devote himself exclusively to the commission's work on the physical valuation of railroads, will be accepted as soon as the President can fill his place.

Mr. Marble was from California. It is certain that the West will expect to supply Mr. Marble's successor, though so far no candidates for his place are known in Washington.

Mr. Clements has strong support for reappointment, and such an outcome would not be surprising. But the friends of Senator Overman of North Carolina are working diligently to obtain the place for Gov. R. B. Glenn of that State. Unless the Governor is appointed they fear he may run against Mr. Overman for the Senate in next Summer's campaign.

D. O. Ives of Boston has been mentioned as a candidate for the vacancy usually filled by a New Englander.

Two New Yorkers have been mentioned prominently for one of the commissionerships—Mila Maltbie and Martin Decker—both of the New York Public Service Commission. Patrick Farrell, solicitor for the commision, has also been suggested.

CARDEN DEMANDS OIL FIELD GUARDS

States show that much inaccurate news is being circulated through these press agents.

A conference between the acting Minister of the Interior and the editors of many newspapers yesterday resulted in the suppression of news which was unfavorable to the Government. Except in the Catholic organs here the news of the capture of Juarez remains unpublished in the vernacular press. The Mexican Herald, published in English, has printed accounts of it. The stories of the fall of Victoria and of the military activity of the rebels throughout the North have also been generally suppressed.

A persistent report has been circulated recently that on account of the breaking off of the negotiations between Dr. Hale and Gen. Carranza the recognition of Huerta by Washington may result. These reports are traced to official sources and are propagated through army officers, but no foundation for them has thus far been discovered. A high official of the War Department asserts that information to this effect has been received by a prominent American here. This is denied, however, by the American who says that he has merely received news that a revulsion of feeling against the rebels is being caused by the atrocities committed at Juarez by Gen. Villa.

Other assertions of this sort have resulted in the publication by the Imparcial of a story to the effect that two American officers have been executed by Villa. This afforded an opportunity for a scathing editorial in the newspaper controlled by the Huerta leader on the floor of the Chamber of Deputies.

The reception of the Maderos on board the Rhode Island after their release on bail is severely commented upon in official circles here. Critics say that there is no objection to John Lind's giving refuge to persons whom he thought in need of it when they were not under the jurisdiction of the courts, but that it was unwarrantable to use American warships as a refuge for Mexicans who were jumping their bail. While the official papers do not criticise this action openly, they are surreptitiously creating adverse opinion toward the United States on this ground.

It is officially stated that a column of 2,000 Federals left Chihuahua City to-day for Juarez to recapture the town.

Believe We Are Helping Rebels.

Much comment is caused by the persistent reports that the rebels have been smuggling considerable quantities of arms and ammunition across the border during the last month. The general impression is gaining strength, not only among officials, but in the Diplomatic Corps, that Washington is winking at this practice, despite the measures ostensibly taken to enforce the neutrality laws. The diplomats, while making no definite charges, shrug their shoulders and say:

"Of course, it cannot be proved, but the fact remains that the rebels have American arms and ammunition, and plenty of them."

OUR BORDER FORCE INCREASED

Addition of Regiment Raises the Total to 20,000 Men.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 22.—The War Department to-day decided to add another regiment to the force patroling the Mexican frontier. Either the Sixteenth Infantry, now in California, or the Twentieth Infantry, in Utah, will be sent to El Paso. The regiment already at El Paso will be scattered along the Rio Grande to the south to strengthen the watch against gun runners.

The addition of this regiment to the force already employed along the boundary and on duty with the Second Division at Texas City will bring the number up to twelve regiments of infantry. The total number of troops now stationed on the border and in Texas is 18,500, and the additional regiment will bring the number very close to 20,000. The total fighting strength of the United States Army in the United States is 47,350, of which number 18,000 is coast artillery. More than two-thirds of the mobile army stationed in the United States is now on duty along the Mexican boundary.

While no explanation is given, it is suggested that this increase in watchfulness may be intended in part to teach the Constitutionalists their error in listening with so little respect to the overtures made to them by the State Department through Dr. William Bayard Hale.

To serve as a garrison and defend the city of El Paso from any possible attack from the south of the line or to police the city in case of rioting it was said that the infantry organization would be as serviceable as the mounted soldiers. On the other hand, not being as mobile, the infantry could scarcely fill the place of cavalry on the border patrol.

That the services of the additional troops might be needed for keeping order along the border was asserted by members of the Texas Congressional delegation, and Secretary Garrison yielded to their appeals when he learned through press dispatches that the Federal leaders were again approaching Juarez, opposite El Paso, and that the rebel General, Villa, who only recently had captured that town, had gone forth to meet the Federals in battle.

Reports of threatened disorders near Laredo, far to the east of El Paso, also reached the War Department, but Gen. Bliss, who transmitted them, at the same time informed the Washington officials that he had dispatched another squadron of the Third Cavalry from Fort Sam Houston, San Antonio, to reinforce the squadron already there.

Meanwhile, unofficial advices here indicate that the rebels are preparing to present more directly the suggestion they made to Dr. Hale, that they be recognized by the United States as de facto rulers of Northern Mexico, from Tuxpam, on the east coast, to Guaymas, on the west. It has been reported that Dr. Hale's inability to promise such recognition was one of the reasons for the sudden termination of the conversations at Nogales.

Hope that Gen. Huerta might indirectly comply with some of the American demands that he had publicly ridiculed came to the Administration to-day in unofficial dispatches from Mexico City. They told how Col. Corral, presiding in the absence of Speaker Tamariz, declared a quorum lacking in the Chamber of Deputies, though the roll disclosed the presence of far more than a majority. Under the Mexican Constitution, it is understood, the absence of a quorum on three successive days automatically dissolves Congress and makes a new election necessary. Mr. Lind demanded the dissolution of the Congress, and his demand was ignored. There is now a faint hope that dissolution will come about in another way before the objectionable concessions granted by Gen. Huerta ratified.

The course of Col. Corral, however, who is understood to be a military supporter of the Huerta régime, might mean only that the Provisional President felt that his position had been regularized by his speech to Congress, and that he was perfectly willing for its dissolution or adjournment to ensue. In a recess of Congress, Mexican emergency legislation is in the hands of an Executive Committee, and this committee would be a more convenient instrument in the hands of the President than an unwieldy Congress of two houses.

Denies Protest to Carden.

Reports from Mexico, published in certain quarters this morning, saying that Secretary Bryan had sharply protested against sending a British cruiser squadron to Vera Cruz, called forth an indignant official denial from Mr. Bryan this afternoon. Mr. Bryan has never encouraged questions as to the truth of reports from Mexico and elsewhere bearing upon the present situation, and has frequently stated with manifestations of anger that he was not called upon to deny them. His statement today, however, was directed largely against the publication of reports without verification. His statement was:

"The statement published this morning to the effect that the State Department has protested against the action of Great Britain in sending two war vessels into Mexican waters is absolutely false; and, in denying the statements, I desire to add condemnation of the publication of statements of that kind without taking time to inquire into their truth or falsity.

"A denial cannot reach all who may read the statement, nor can it prevent discussions and editorial comments predicated on false statements. Surely in international affairs there ought to be a desire to promote friendly relations, and these cannot be promoted by reckless publications of false statements in regard to acts of Government officials."

Recent criticisms of the course of American diplomacy in regard to Mexico appear not to have changed official intentions here. There were plain intimations to-day that persons high in the Administration felt that efforts were being made in interested quarters to force an issue in Mexico or to bring pressure upon the Administration for a more aggressive policy. Similar intimations have been made from time to time.

Oil Field Situation Improved.

The situation at Tampico and Tuxpam, where large American and British interests were imperilled by the rebels, has greatly improved as a result of Gen. Aguilar's promise yesterday to act with international propriety toward the large oil holdings in the vicinity. As a result of this promise, the battleship New Hampshire to-day left Tuxpam and returned to Vera Cruz. The fact that one of the British cruisers is now at Tampico, a few miles up the coast from Tuxpam, indicates that there is enough co-operation between the war vessels of the United States and Great Britain to make unnecessary their simultaneous presence at a threatened point.

Constitutionalists in Washington are not inclined to take at their face value the remarks of Lord Cowdray that the American Waters-Pierce Oil Company was responsible for the Madero revolution, and that concessions to Lord Cowdray under the Administration of Gen. Porfiro Diaz had been approved by President Madero. In this connection they issued to-day a letter from the late President Madero to one of his investigators, in which he said that he had merely promised Lord Cowdray to support concessions shown to be lawful. The outcome of his investigation into Lord Cowdray's title to his concessions is not disclosed. The letter says:

Mexico, Oct. 13, 1911.

Mr. Jose Vasconcelos, Present:

My Esteemed Friend: Replying to your letter relative to the petroleum interests of our country, I have to state that my recent declarations to Lord Cowdray concerning the attitude which the Government would assume toward the oil concessions granted to him under the administration of Gen. Diaz were limited to an assurance that, if said concessions had been granted in conformity with the law, and if the concessionaire had complied with all the conditions thereof, the Government would respect them.

I made no declaration in respect to what would be my attitude in case the said concessions should have been granted in violation of the provisions of the Constitution, as is your opinion. I only added that I would oppose the formation in Mexico of all kinds of monopolies or combinations tending to limit competition in trade. Your affectionate friend,

FRANCISCO I. MADERO.

President Wilson has received a protest from Minority Leader Mann of the House against lifting the embargo on arms in favor of the rebels. The protest was based upon a letter Mr. Mann received from a friend, described as having a wide knowledge of Mexican affairs. This friend said that the free shipment of arms would mean only that every "bad man" in Mexico would have a rifle, and that he would put his new weapon to the worst possible use.

DEPUTIES NAME COMMITTEES.

Organization of Mexican House Completed—Rebels in Oil Fields.

MEXICO CITY, Nov. 22.—The Chamber of Deputies completed the details of organization to-day, appointing House committees.

In the lobbies and at the National Palace the idea prevailed that President Huerta was fixed in his determination to permit the new Congress to continue and was planning to carry out the programme of the Government for the pacification of the country.

The officers of the little garrison of Ixtapalapa, a suburb of the Federal capital, were arrested to-day and are to be tried by court-martial for alleged complicity in a plot to start a military uprising. Government officials say that a search of the houses in the suburb brought forth evidence connecting some prominent Mexican army officers with the conspiracy.

Rebels now control a district in which are located some of the camps of the Pearson syndicate in the Tuxpan district of the State of Vera Cruz, including the island of Potreros, of which Thomas Coleman, an American, is alleged to have been dispossessed, and regarding which Nelson O'Shaughnessy, the American Chargé d'Affaires, is treating with the Mexican Foreign Office.

The rebels are not interfering with the work in the oil camps, but are contenting themselves with collecting tribute from the camps.

VERA CRUZ, Nov. 22.—Consul Clarence A. Miller of Tampico reports in a wireless dispatch from the United States battleship Nebraska that he has sent a special messenger to Gen. Candido Aguilar, the rebel commander, with a letter from Capt. Spencer S. Wood, the commander of the Nebraska, giving a warning against the destruction of foreign property. He also advised the oil companies to remain neutral and not pay war taxes.

Five hundred Mexican troops left this city by train last night for Orizaba, seventy miles southwest of Vera Cruz, where the insurgents are reported to be becoming active.

The Mexican gunboats Zaragoza and Vert Cruz and the transport Progreso left this port during the night with troops and supplies for Tuxpam and Tampico. There are now no Mexican war vessels here.

FRENCH REFUGEES ESCAPE.

Reach San Francisco from Santa Rosalia—Rebels Beat Four.

SAN FRANCISCO, Nov. 22.—A party of French and other foreign residents of Santa Rosalia, Mex., fleeing from an expected capture of the town by Constitutionalists, reached this city to-day. There were several women in the party, and Dr. P. Rehue, who headed it, said that about 100 French women had been taken aboard foreign merchant ships lying in the harbor on the occasion of the last Constitutionalist attack on Dec. 26.

At the time of the fight fifty rurales succeeded in driving back the attacking party after a short struggle in which two men were killed and several wounded. The foreign residents, however, felt that this protection was insufficient, said Dr. Rehue, and all were planning to leave soon.

Four French citizens, he said, were taken prisoners by the insurgents and beaten almost to death. The hatred of the French in Santa Rosalia, he said, was due to a large French mining company having given food and water to the Federal troops during the siege of Guaymas.

To Attend Conference on Rumanian Jews.

Samuel Friedman of 434 Broadway, who has been identified with many civic movements, accepted yesterday his election as a delegate to the International Congress on the Rumanian Jewish situation to be held in Berlin from Jan. 23 to 31. Mr. Friedman was among the delegates selected at the Cooper Union meeting of protest which followed the action of Rumania in refusing to fulfill the promise of citizenship made to 30,000 Jews who had been enlisted in the Balkan war.

THREE MONEY BILLS REPORTED TO SENATE

Chairman Owen Submits the Original Measure Without Recommending Its Enactment.

SAYS BANKS WANT CHANGE

Welcome Provisions in His Bill, He Asserts, Which Give Better Market for Commercial Paper.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 22.—After nearly three months of preliminary work the Committee on Banking and Currency reported to-day three drafts of the Owen-Glass bill to the Senate. The original Owen-Glass bill went to the calendar on Chairman Owen's request, but without any recommendation for its enactment. Dissenting views of the equally divided committee explained and supported the two modified forms of the bill.

After these views were presented Chairman Owen moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of currency reform. His motion was formally agreed to. The Owen-Glass bill became the Senate's unfinished business and debate will begin on Monday, when a set defense of the House bill as modified by the Democrats of his committee will be made by Mr. Owen. The latter announced that he would make no effort to obtain a vote on any amendments before the end of the session.

The presentation of the three measures caused a little parliamentary confusion. It was pointed out that there was scarcely a precedent for the course now followed by the committee in its effort to get before the Senate a measure of which the committee did not approve.

Finally, however, Mr. Owen's motion regularizing the status of the House bill and opening the road to free discussion and amendment in the Senate, was adopted by unanimous consent. This consent, however, was given only after it was expresely stated that previous unanimous consents regarding the Hetch-Hetchy Valley bill and the bill for the construction of a railroad in Alaska should not be impaired.

A last attempt at bringing the present session to an end was made in the Senate to-day when Mr Myers of Montana presented a concurrent resolution directing the Vice President and the Speaker to adjourn the two Houses without date on Monday at 2 o'clock.

Mr. Myers quickly became involved in a parliamentary tangle, however, and his motions to take up his resolution were defeated without regard to the merits of his proposal. His resolution will come up under the ordinary course on Monday and will be again defeated.

In his report Mr. Owen pointed out the similarities between the various bills. But he admitted that the committee's study had resulted in a clearage over such fundamental questions as the ownership of the proposed system and its control by central authority.

Mr. Owen laid emphasis on a statement that the New York banks would be glad of the provisions in his bill supplying a market for commercial paper so that bank funds could be used in that direction instead of in the speculative call market. Prominent bankers, he said, had assured him of the eagerness with which they looked forward to the establishment of a market for commercial paper. He seemed to think his bill would satisfy them on this point.

Mr. Hitchcock of Nebraska in presenting the report for the other side referred to the action of the full committee before outside influences by Mr. O'Gorman of New York and Mr. Reed of Missouri to desert the majority and leave the committee equally divided. The amendments made by the full committee, he said, were now approved by the half of the committee that he represented. Their fundamental idea, he said, was the practical superiority of a central bank of issue over any other system. They had compromised, however, in favor of four regional banks centrally controlled. He expressed the view that adequate machinery had been provided to make this compromise efficient.

NAVY TO MAKE UNIFORMS.

Daniels Plans to Establish Tailoring Outfit at Charleston Yard.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 22.—In line with his policy of utilizing navy stations and yards in the South, where large expenditures have been made for buildings, Secretary Daniels has decided to establish at the Charleston Navy Yard a manufacturing plant for the production of such parts of marine and naval militia uniforms that can be economically made there. The Secretary has made a thorough investigation of the cost of making such articles on contract or in the open market, and finds that the Government can effect a large saving by doing the work itself. Labor conditions and the proximity to Southern cotton mills promise more than ordinary economy in a plant at Charleston, and the money is available to install the machinery required.

The plan accords with the Secretary's determination to ask Congress for as little money as possible for buildings at Navy Yards and shore stations. Mr. Daniels said to-day that the new shops at Charleston would not curtail operations in the shops at New York or Philadelphia.

WANT PINDELL CONFIRMED.

Democrats to Get Senate to Approve Nomination Before Session Ends.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 22.—Democratic Senators friendly to the appointment of H. M. Pindell, the Peoria publisher, as Ambassador to Russia, said to-day that they would make an extreme effort to obtain confirmation of his nomination before the end of next week. Should the Senate fail to act before the special session ends on Dec. 1, the nomination would fail and President Wilson would have to make it again to the regular session.

The Foreign Relations Committee will take up the Pindell case Wednesday. Several members have served notice that they will ask for an investigation of correspondence between Mr. Pindell and an Illinois Representative, involving an alleged discussion of post office appointments. These members probably will ask that the nomination be referred to a sub-committee.

Republicans behind the request for an investigation would not indicate to-day how far they would go in opposing Mr. Pindell should a fight develop on the floor of the Senate.

MAY JUDGE CHANGE MIND?

U. S. Supreme Court Will Decide In a Kansas Jail Case.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 22. – A Kansas Judge sentenced Henry Meyer to jail for three months and to pay a fine of $100 for contempt in violating a liquor injunction. Twelve hours later the Judge recalled Meyer from jail and made his sentence six months.

The Supreme Court of Kansas held that the trial Judge was powerless to set aside the first sentence, and that this must be served out. Meyer contends that the Judge set aside the first sentence, but was without power to impose a second sentence, so that he is a free man. The Supreme Court of the United States will decide.

The demand for merchandise of the standard maintained by James McCreery & Co. is diminishing at Twenty-third Street. Rather than lower our standard in the slightest degree in order to meet the changed conditions, it was decided to close permanently the Twenty-third Street branch of James McCreery & Co.

Moving the stock of the Twenty-third Street Store means that we have doubled at the Thirty-fourth Street Store the extensive assortments of this Season's Merchandise and Holiday Goods.

The buying public of Greater New York and its surroundings have been familiar in detail with the excellent assortment of reliable merchandise carried at the Twenty-third Street branch of James McCreery & Co. These assortments consisted of the newest merchandise and were exact counterparts of the stock in the up-town store. Consequently the 34th Street Store will present a two-store assortment of Fall merchandise starting to-morrow, Monday, and continuing throughout the holiday season.

This affords an unprecedented opportunity to make selections from an unlimited assortment of this season's high-class merchandise at unequaled prices

With our organization augmented by the addition of the staff of the Twenty-third Street Store the general efficiency of the service of the establishment will be maintained notwithstanding the increased demands which will be made upon us, commencing tomorrow, Monday, November the 24th.

SULZER STAGE DEBUT DRAWS ONLY $500

Buffalo Promoters Lose Money When He Lectures on "The Treason of Tammany."

Special to The New York Times.

BUFFALO, Nov. 22.—William Sulzer opened his lecture tour here to-night, speaking to a gathering of about 2,000 persons, in the Broadway Auditorium, and most of them were keenly disappointed. The much-heralded exposure of "The Treason of Tammany" failed to develop anything half as sensational as the press agent promised. The local promoters lost money on the venture, as Mr. Sulzer received $1,000 for his speech and the total receipts did not reach $500.

The ex-Governor said his break with Charles F. Murphy and Tammany Hall was the sole reason for his removal, and he went over all the charges that he made in the New York City campaign after his impeachment.

The crisis came, he said, over Mr. Murphy's demand for the appointment of James Gaffney as Commissioner of Highways. At a Washington hotel on March 5, he said, Mr. Murphy served notice on him that it would be "Gaffney or war."

This threat, the ex-Governor said, was further emphasized at a meeting with Mr. Murphy, at which appointments to the Supreme Court bench were discussed.

"It was in this conference," said Mr. Sulzer, "that Mr. Murphy said to me: 'Unless you do what I want you to do I will wreck your Administration as Governor, block all your legislation, and defeat all your appointments. Remember, I control the Legislature as the Legislature can control the Governor.'

"He also threatened me with public disgrace unless I agreed to his programme on legislation matters and appointments. It was at this conference, too, that he talked about things he had on me; said that I better listen to him and not to his enemies up-State, and that if I did what he told me to do I would have things easy and no trouble and that if I didn't do what he wanted me to do, I would have all the trouble I wanted.

"He was very insulting. I asked him what he could do to destroy me? He said, 'Never mind; you will find out in good time. Stand by Tammany and you will be all right. If you go against the organization I will make your administration the laughing stock of the State.'"

It was about this time, Mr. Sulzer said, whe.. the Tammany chief demanded the calling off of George W. Blake and John A. Hennessy, special Commissioners under the Moreland act, who were investigating State Prison and other State departments.

"My final interview with Murphy," said he, "was late on the night of April 13. It was marked in my memory by his insolence to me and by the sordid brutality of his demands. Before we parted that night I warned Murphy that he would wreck the party and accomplish his own destruction if he persisted in shielding grafters and violating pledges."

While his first split with Mr. Murphy came over appointments and legislation, Mr. Sulzer said, the final break came when Murphy demanded the calling off of Blake and Hennessy.

"The real trouble, the final issue," said Mr. Sulzer, "came when I discovered, through agencies which I set to work, the tremendous frauds and overwhelming corruption existing in various departments of the State Government by which a few politicians and contractors were robbing the taxpayers of a million dollars a year."

PLAN BIGELOW MEMORIAL.

Union College Alumni Propose to Get Money for a Building.

A meeting of a committee of Union College alumni, organized to arrange for a memorial to the late John Bigelow, was held yesterday afternoon at the home of Dr. George Alexander, 47 University Place, to consider ways and means of obtaining money for a proposed memorial building at Union College, in Schenectady. Among those present were Dr. George Alexander, Dr. Alexander Richmond, President of Union College; Dr. Alexander Duane, Thomas H. Fearey, C. Laurence Mead, and W. D. Haydecker, Secretary of the committee.

Dr. Richmond, a member of the General Committee, reported that about $18,000 had been obtained for the proposed memorial.

CHASES THIEVES OVER ROOFS

Policeman Catches Two Youths Who Hold Up Man and Woman.

When William Austin and his wife were approaching their home at 313 East 125th Street at 2 o'clock yesterday morning four youths jumped from a hallway and set upon them, but though Mrs. Austin was struck across the face and Austin was pinioned, the victims made such an uproar that their assailants fled. Two escaped into the darkness, but after a chase over roofs and a battle in the dark room of a vacant flat near-by, Patrolman McKenna of the East 126th Street Station captured the other two.

Neither of those captured is more than 17 years old. One said he was James Hinchey of 301 East 125th Street, and the other said he was Miles McCue of 319 St. Ann's Avenue, the Bronx. They will be examined in the Harlem Court to-morrow.

A limited but remarkable sale of

Baby Pony Coats

of which twenty-seven only will be offered tomorrow

at $37.50

Should not be confused with ordinary ponyskin fur coats, to which they are far superior.

The pelts in these coats are known as Baby Pony. They are superlatively soft, and light weight, beautiful in lustre, and rich in the character of their marking. Such furs as are usually employed in garments sold around $75 each. But there are only twenty-seven of them, the limited number being responsible for the limited price.

Fourth Floor.

Made in an entirely new model with collar of leopard, chinchilla squirrel, skunk or civet cat, and exquisitely tailored and finished.

Also, very special for Monday

THINKS CHICAGO IS EASY TO SHOCK

Women's National Council Sees Nothing to Object To in Films Banned in the West.

DOG EATERS BARRED THERE

Also Boys That Go in Swimming Sans Bathing Suits—Tango Teas Are Also Beyond the Pale.

Motion-picture films that had passed the censors in New York only to be cast out of Chicago's theatres by the municipal authorities were exhibited at the Crystal Palace Motion-Picture Theatre in Fourteenth Street last night under the auspices of the National Council of Women.

The suppressed pictures were shown to an audience composed almost entirely of women, although regular patrons of the theatre were not excluded. Miss Kate Davis, Chairman of the Committee on Motion Pictures of the National Council of Women, brought the films of questioned pictures here with her from Chicago and had charge of the exhibition last night. Some of the films considered improper under the Chicago standards provoked applause from New York women who saw the exhibit.

Miss Davis made a speech before any of the suppressed films were exhibited. She said that the purpose was to show the delegates to the National Council of Women what was aimed at in the suppression of improper motion-picture plays. She said that the National League for Regulation of Motion-Picture Plays was trying to start campaigns in all parts of the country to obtain more adequate censoring than was now provided.

As the film machine began to splutter at the conclusion of the speech by Miss Davis, those in the audience forgot to breathe until they could see how deadly the first forbidden reel might be. On the screen a pond took shape, very like the ponds that are made famous in paintings under the caption of "The Old Swimming Hole." It was a swimming hole, too, as it turned out, for from the left margin a small black urchin came bounding. He landed in the water feet up after a double somersault from the shore. Forty other little urchins followed him, and there was a water fight in which all that could be observed were the splashes.

"What on earth is the matter with that?" a member of the Women's Municipal League asked.

"Why didn't you see?" said Miss Davis, "there were no bathing suits."

It was clear from the comment that passed through the auditorium that the New York women did't find the water fight objectionable.

The second picture showed a toe-dancer in the centre of the stage. A chorus filled in the background.

"No toe-dancing is allowed in Chicago films," explained Miss Davis. Several women protested that the scene was proper. They wanted to know what would happen in Chicago to a film showing a tango tea.

"It never would go," insisted the Chairman of the Censorship Committee: "It never would go. We simply do not allow the modern dances. You see we hold that the films are for the young folks, and that any films that might carry suggestions to them ought not to be allowed."

From the toe dance the machine switched to an Igorrote village in the Philippines. There was a background of cocoanut trees and a multiude of huts. In the foreground a father stirred a pot over a slow fire, while little urchins reached in at frequent intervals and obtained food which they stuffed into their mouths.

As these urchins were plentifully clothed, the spectators from the Women's Municipal League wondered what objection there could be to the film.

Miss Davis whispered the answer: "It's dog they're eating—dog!"

Some of the pictures showed bandits holding up trains or safe blowers at work in offices. Others dealt with plots to poison young girls for their money. One showed a grave-robbing scene, in which the body—it was the very beautiful body of a young woman—was taken from a costly coffin and spirited away in a taxicab. These films, it was explained, had been suppressed because they taught boys the details of crime.

The National Council of Women, at the request of Miss Davis, passed a resolution calling upon Mayor-elect Mitchel "to use his moral influence to give the City of New York a municipal motion-picture regulation." Another resolution which was passed called upon the women of all nations to unite to bring about censorship of films in their towns.

"3-CENT FARES A FAILURE."

Head of Cleveland Lines Says City Should Buy or Give Up.

CLEVELAND, Ohio, Nov. 22.—"Three-cent fares are a failure and the city should either buy the street railway lines at once or give up the Tayler franchise as a bad job."

This is the substance of a statement issued by John Stanley, President of the Cleveland Street Railways Company, to-day in connection with the October report of the company's condition under the three-cent care ordinance.

"I advise Mayor Baker to go ahead at once, raise the necessary $29,000,000 and buy," said Mr. Stanley.

The report shows that it will not be necessary to charge one ent for transfers starting Jan. 1, 1914, as was expected, but that such a charge will be necessary after March 1, 1914. Under the Tayler ordinance the company must constantly show an interest fund of $300,000. While this fund is not immediately threatened, it will be in March, when the city must provide for a maintenance deficit of $217,444.60.

ERROR MAY COST HER $8,000

Texas Widow's Damage Suit Hinges on Slim Technicality.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 22.—It may cost Mrs. Peter C. Boston of Paris, Texas, $8,000 to learn "what's in a name."

She sued a Texas railroad for damages on account of the death of her husband and obtained a judgment of $8,000. The suit was brought in her own name, as permitted by the Texas Employers' Liability law, but not as administrator of her husband's estate as required by the Federal Employers' Liability law. The railroad brought the case to the Supreme Court on the contention that the Texas law was repealed by the passage of the Federal act, and that Mrs. Boston brought her suit under the wrong name.

LESSON TO HEARST, SAYS PRENDERGAST

Editor Richly Deserved the Defeat of His Candidates, Controller Asserts.

TELLS OF FUSION HARMONY

Interviewed in Paris, He Remarks That "Tammany, Like Evil, Never Dies."

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, Nov. 22.—Controller William A. Prendergast, who has been in London and Paris the past week, resting after his New York campaign for re-election, sails to-morrow on the Kaiserin Auguste. In an interview he gave to THE NEW YORK TIMES correspondent concerning the New York municipal outlook, he said:

"No set of officials ever assumed office under better auspices than those elected two weeks ago, as fortunately they've all had complete experience in city Government. The day before I sailed Mr. Mitchel, Mr. McAneny, and myself had a meeting at which we discussed briefly the work for the next four years. By this you may be certain there'll be absolute harmony in the Board of Estimate and Apportionment. We are all going to work for the city's welfare, not as individuals each intent on his own ambitions and glory, but just as if we were all members in a co-partnership with the same interests at heart."

Asked concerning Mr. Hearst's campaign in opposition to him and Mr. McAneny, Mr. Prendergast referred to his and Mr. McAneny's pluralities being greater than the entire vote cast for Mr. Hearst's candidates.

"It was the most salutary lesson ever administered to a political editor, and one that he richly deserved," he said.

As to Tammany Mr. Prendergast remarked: "Tammany, like evil, never dies."

The Controller was the guest of honor at the Ritz Hotel to-day at a luncheon given by William H. Ingram. The guests included Ambassador Herrick, Frederick Bode of Chicago, American delegate to the International Customs Congress; B. J. Shoninger, President of the American Chamber of Commerce; Laurence V. Benet, Henry Peartree, Alfred D. Heidelbach, M. P. Pelxotto, William Hogan, and William J. Thomas.

GARY HAS A GAINSBOROUGH.

Bought "The Market Cart" Last May—Sold in London for $100,000.

Gainsborough's famous painting, "The Market Cart," has been acquired by Judge E. H. Gary, Chairman of the Board of Directors of the United States Steel Corporation, and is now in his collection at his home, 856 Fifth Avenue. Judge Gary said at his home last night that he had been in possession of "The Market Cart" since last May. He declined to say what price he paid for the painting, but did say that it was bought by Agnew at the Christie sale in London this year for $100,000.

"The Market Cart" is one of Gainsborough's most famous landscapes. Formerly it was exhibited in the National Galleries. Apparently the price paid for "The Market Cart" by Judge Gary is far from being the highest price paid for a Gainsborough in this country. It will be remembered that H. C. Frick in June, 1911, bought Gainsborough's portrait of the Hon. Anna E. Duncombe. The Duveens, through whom he purchased the portrait, had held it for $400,000, and at the time of the sale it was rumored that Mr. Frick had paid nearly $500,000 for the painting.

PLUNGES IN AUTO INTO SEA.

Terribly Hurt, Crapo Keeps Head Above Water an Hour Till Rescued.

BRISTOL, R. I., Nov. 22.—An automobile plunged into Narragansett Bay to-day over a sea wall on the estate of Samuel P. Colt, President of the United States Rubber Company, causing serious injuries to Phineas A. Crapo, foreman of the estate. Crapo was the only occupant of the car.

Suffering from a broken leg, a possible fracture at the base of the skull, and internal injuries, Crapo managed to keep his head above water for nearly an hour until he was assisted by fishermen. He was removed to the Union Hospital in Fall River, Mass.

A Christmas Gift

For All the Family

AND it's the greatest gift of all .... the gift of making music! The exuberance of youth, the meditation of age, the romance of the 'teens and twenties, all find ready expression in music. That is why all ages of mankind love music. There is in music—in the making of music—enjoyment of the highest, of the most satisfying type. It is the enjoyment that comes of self-expression. It is a pleasure which can be shared by every member of the family, and which wields a culturing influence that lifts it out of the realm of mere amusement.

Yesterday the piano was the universal home musical instrument, but through it only the few with trained and talented fingers experienced the joy and fascination of making music. Today, a new and wonderful instrument has come to take the piano's place. It is

The Pianola

"The World's Greatest Musical Instrument."

An instrument that is the piano, and more—the piano and the art to play.

The Pianola brings within the reach of everyone, the privilege, not merely of hearing music, but also of making it. It opens to everyone, not only the beauties of the world of music, but, as well, the fascination, the satisfaction, the broadening influence of practiced self-expression.

You want the Pianola in your home. You want it for yourself, for your family—particularly for the children. You want it for the pleasure it will bring. You want it for its aid to the understanding of good music, which modern culture demands, and you want it to help your children in their music study, for it is the greatest musical educator in the world.

Can you think of any other gift that could bring into your home this Christmas, such pleasure, such inspiration? And a gift that is enduring—that will carry happiness and good cheer through the years and years to come!

Mary and her set like—

Grieg's Butterfly
Dvorak s Humoreske
The Rosary
Tosti's Goodbye
Prologue from Pagliacci
Celeste Aida
Liszt Rhapsodies
Brahm's Hungarian Dances
Sweethearts

George and the fellows like—

Peg o' My Heart
International Rag
Isle d'Amour
There's a Girl in the Heart of Maryland
Adele Selections

and everything of the Cohan, Lauder, Irving Berlin nature, that is not more than two months old.

You may buy a Pianola for as little as $550—in a first payment of $25 or more and the balance in convenient weekly or monthly payments if you desire. And now just a word of caution—you can buy the Pianola, in New York, only at Aeolian Hall. The Pianola is made only by the Aeolian Company, and in these models exclusively:

The Steinway Pianola
The Steck Pianola — The Wheelock Pianola
The Stuyvesant Pianola — The Stroud Pianola
The famous Weber Pianola

On Sale, in New York, only at Aeolian Hall

KING OF PICKPOCKETS POSES AS PATRIARCH

Seized for Taking a Girl's Purse, His Venerable Appearance Raises Doubt of Guilt.

FAILS TO FOOL LIEUT. FINN

Recognized by Him, His Identity as an International Thief Is Established at Headquarters.

Headed for her home in Stapleton, S. I., Emma Koener was standing in an eddy of the jostling crowd at Fourteenth Street and Sixth Avenue soon after 6 o'clock last evening, when there was a hubbub of cries from all about her, and she was told by two excited girls that her pocket had been picked. Only a few feet away N. J. St. Clair of 8 Van Dam Street had collared a bewildered man of patriarchal appearance and was triumphantly assuring her that he had caught the thief.

Miss Koener felt in the pocket of her coat. Her purse was gone, with its contents of some small change and a set of gold earrings. Then she, too, joined the hubbub, and by the time Patrolman Burke took charge of the old man there were four persons ready to go to the Mercer Street Station as witnesses against the prisoner.

All the way to the station the man with the long gray beard and injured expression kept assuring them that he had been a respectable shoe manufacturer and that, for all his fairly prosperous appearance, he was now a guest of the Salvation Army in the Bowery. As for the young woman's pocket-book, all he asked was for them to search him. They did search him and there was no pocket-book.

Inside the walls of the station the old man, who said he was George Morgan, stood, patient, saintly, stately, while the stories were told, but when it came to recording a complaint Miss Koener faltered. After all, she had not seen the poor old gentleman pick her pocket. The witnesses, too, became uncertain. They were not sure they cared to swear to any accusation. Certainly, the pocket-book was not on the stranger, and it would be such a dreadful thing to make a wrongful accusation.

Even the muscular St. Clair became suddenly doubtful as to the reliability of his own eyes, and the case was fast sagging. It looked as though they would have to release their prisoner, and the prisoner himself had stopped stroking his beard long enough to assume the expression of one about to announce a manly, righteous determination to bring no penalty suit for false arrest when his train of thought was rudely flagged by Lieut. Finn.

"I think you're an old crook," observed Lieut. Finn.

The old man cast at him a glance of infinite reproach.

"I do," said Finn, stubbornly. "I think I've seen you before. Take him down to Headquarters as a suspicious person."

All the way down to Centre Market Place Morgan painted dismal pictures of the plight of the police for thus putting him to such indignity, and this flow of protest did not cease until the finger prints had actually been taken and the records searched to reveal him as none other than Henry Morgan, otherwise Scotch Jack, otherwise Henry King, otherwise the "King of the Pickpockets." Then the prisoner, with candor regained, spoke himself of having spent thirty years in prison.

The records bore this out. They showed that Scotch Jack had been arrested here as long ago as 1887; that his convictions in this city alone numbered more than a half dozen; that he had specialized also in shoplifting, and operated with unlucky results in Rochester, Boston and Lynn, Philadelphia, London, Berlin, and Paris. His Rogues' Gallery pictures showed him in all his stages, from the venerable man photographed in this city in 1910, to the dapper, dark-haired man recorded back in the eighties.

Morgan is 70 years old, and he is locked up in the Mercer Street Station while the police think about his case. He admits his past, but will not admit having taken Miss Koener's pocketbook.

"Jack" Geraghty for Alderman.

STOLEN WHEN A BOY, NOW FINDS HIS HOME

Kidnapped Fourteen Years Ago, Punxsutawney Youth Has Just Found Out His Identity.

SPEEDING BACK TO MOTHER

John James Hurley Thinks Father Stole Him, and Tells of Wanderings in Many States.

Special to The New York Times.

SEATTLE, Wash., Nov. 22.—John James Hurley, who was kidnapped fourteen years ago, is speeding back to his mother, sisters, and brothers at Punxsutawney, Penn., to-night, his identification having been fully established by the Seattle police and those of his old home town.

John James, as he was known until a few days ago, was stolen from his mother at Punxsutawney when he was six years old. He always has believed that his kidnapper was his father. He knew the man as Hurley. The mother in Pennsylvania has kept up a search for the boy, and John James, remembering coal mines and Pennsylvania and a town the name of which was so odd he could never bring it from his childhood memories, also has striven to establish his identity. Since having been cast off five years ago by the man who stole him he has been busy sending letters to the police of various towns in Pennsylvania.

Mrs. Emma Floetke, who had a boarding house in a Washington lumber camp where John James worked, heard his story, and, having lived in Western Pennsylvania, she advised him to write to Punxsutawney. He did so two weeks ago, and an answer came from Chief of Police Palmer and one from the mother. Through the exchange of letters John James's identity has been fully established.

John James thinks that the first town to which he was taken after he was stolen was Chicago. His kidnapper, who was a coal miner, then took him to Belt, Mont. Later they went to Helena, Mont., and back again to Crescent, Penn., where the boy was placed in a Catholic brothers' school. From there they went to Spokane, where he was placed in Gonzaga College. At 15 John James worked with Hurley in the mines, all the time inquiring as to who his relatives were, but receiving little enlightenment. He says a man named O'Connor, a friend of Hurley, had promised to tell him the story of his life some day, and never had done so.

"I have no complaint to make against the man Hurley, who kidnapped me, whether he was my father or some one else," said the young man. "I can't understand, however, why he had me sent to the State training school at Chehalis from Spokane. I was a good boy, and he must have hatched up some story to have me sent away. I believe, now, that he had anticipated abandoning me, and was either broke or discouraged, and after having watched over me and seen to my education in the best schools of his religion for those many years, did not desire me to be thrown upon the world so young."

John James says Hurley was about 59 years old when he last saw him.

A telegram from the Chief of Police of Punxsutawney yesterday said that the mother had married again, and that her name was Hughes.

Nassau Agricultural Society Officers

HEMPSTEAD, L. I., Nov. 22.—The seventy-second annual election of the Nassau Agricultural Society was held this afternoon in Exhibition Hall with 150 members of the society present. These officers were elected: John N. Vanderver, Newtown, L. I., President; E. Covert Hulst, Flushing, Vice President, and Thomas H. Bacon, Hempstead, Treasurer.

FEDERAL COURTS CROWDED.

New Quarters May Be Provided in the Woolworth Building.

So inadequate has the accommodation for the Federal Courts become that United States District Attorney Marshall purposes to hire two floors in one of the downtown office buildings, not improbably the Woolworth Building, for judicial and courtroom purposes. By the direction of the four District Judges, Holt, Hough, Hand, and Mayer, he has drafted a bill to be introduced into Congress asking for an appropriation of $100,000 for four additional courtrooms. Senator O'Gorman will introduce the bill at the December session.

The civil and criminal calendars of the Federal Courts are now nearly three years behind time. But recently District Attorney Marshall induced Congress to pass a measure by which Federal Judges from other jurisdictions who were not busy could come to this district and try cases here. He hopes soon to have several of these visiting Judges at work, and will then be able to clear up the dockets. At present a person arrested may be kept for months in jail without trial if he cannot provide bail, and the authorities feel hesitation in ever bringing a man who has been out for years on bail to trial, because it may be that some of the defendant's witnesses are dead and he would be a sufferer through the law's delay.

If the new courtrooms are established they will be used in equity and lawsuits which do not require a jury. All criminal cases will still be tried in the present Federal Court House.

FOG HINDERS SHIPPING.

Collision Off Pier A — All Liners Delayed In Docking.

The fog which hung over the lower bay from early morning until yesterday afternoon and extended as far as Fire Island caused considerable delay in the river traffic and held up both the inbound and outbound ocean liners.

The steamship New Haven of the New England Steamship Company, inbound from Providence, and Scow 16 of the Crescent Sand Company were in collision off Pier A, North River. The scow was damaged to the extent of $2,000 and was towed to her pier by the tug George F. Fill of the Tice Towing Company of 17 Battery Place.

Among the liners held up were the White Star ship Adriatic, which docked at 1:15 o'clock instead of 8 o'clock in the morning; the Perugia of the Anchor Line from Palermo, and the French liner France, which did not get to her pier until nearly 7 o'clock last night.

$1,000,000 NEEDED TO COMPLETE FUND

Leader of Y. M.-Y. W. C. A. Campaign Confident It Will Be Obtained To-morrow.

NO GIFTS ARE HELD BACK

Yesterday's Total of $41,359 Not Enough to Win Two Conditonal Gifts of $50,000 Each.

There was disappointment at the noonday luncheon yesterday in the campaign headquarters at 25 Broad Street when only $41,359 was announced by the leaders of the Building Fund of the Young Men's and Young Women's Christian Associations. The disappoinement was keen because, if the workers had raised $3,000,000 by noon yesterday, two contributions of $50,000 each would have been forthcoming. Their spirits were cheered, however, by the announcement by George W. Perkins, Chairman of the Executive Committee that, if they raised $3,400,000 by to-morrow noon, the $100,000 would be given just the same. They were a little more than $3,000 short of the required $3,000,000 yesterday, and will have more than $408,000 to raise by to-morrow noon to insure the contributions of $100,000.

Gen. Bramwell Booth came direct to the luncheon from his reception by the Mayor at the City Hall. He was accompanied by his sister, Miss Evangeline Booth. Col. L. Mervin Maus, surgeon in the United States Army of the Department of the East, was another speaker at the luncheon. He said that the introduction of the Y. M. C. A. and the abolition of the canteen in 1901 had increased the sobriety of the army by 50 per cent. He added that he wished there was a Young Men's Christian Association in every army post.

The Women's Committee, with its $21,797, again led the field for the day. The total amount raised was $41,359, which makes a grand total to date of $2,991,342. There have been 8,321 subscribers to date, which means that more than 80,000 persons have been canvassed.

The following subscribed $1,000 or more:

Anna Dodge McCullough	$5,000
Altman & Co.	2,000
Anonymous	2,000
Clarence H. Mackay	1,000
August Belmont	1,000
James P. Taylor	1,000
H. C. Fahnestock	1,000
Anonymous	1,000

The rumor that some large subscriptions are being held for the last day was denied emphatically yesterday by the general manager, Charles S. Ward, in this statement:

There is not a dollar held back. Every subscription that we are sure of has been announced daily. We are confident of success, but our confidence is based on our knowledge of the cumulative effect of these campaigns. In Philadelphia $335,000 was subscribed on the last day. This included one memorial gift of $150,000 by persons who had not before been interested, but were influenced by the large number of small gifts showing appreciation of the association. We shall get this last million in New York in the same way, in a multitude of small gifts and a few very large ones. Any holding back now would mean defeat. Success will come by the united effort of loyal citizens.

George W. Perkins, Chairman of the Executive Committee, said yesterday that the fact that 8,000 persons had subscribed to the fund proved that there was an actual demand for the buildings to be erected from the proceeds of the $4,000,000 fund.

"There is a lack," said Mr. Perkins, "of gifts from $1,000 to $10,000. There have been more $25,000 gifts so far than $10,000 gifts. There is a world of people in this city who could give from $1,000 to $10,000, and if they would subscribe now it would make it much easier to raise the required amount."

A letter was sent yesterday to 200 of the leading ministers of this city. It said:

My Dear Sir: You are doubtless watching with keen interest the progress of the Y. W. C. A.-Y. M. C. A. campaign. By Saturday night we hope to cross the three million mark, and then it will be a question of raising $1,000,000 additional before Tuesday, a herculean task, but we believe it can be accomplished if the entire city is awakened to the importance of this undertaking. A large part of the money already pledged is conditioned on our getting the entire $4,000,000, so it is all important that we reach the goal.

Will you be good enough to urge the matter on your congregation Sunday morning, and permit us to place in each pew subscription cards like the inclosed, to be taken up with the collection and mailed to H. P. Davison, Treasurer, care J. P. Morgan & Co., 23 Wall Street?

If some member of your church is working on our committee, he would doubtless be glad if you would announce his name as one willing to receive subscriptions at the close of the service.

Of even greater importance than the result in pledges will be, we believe, the impression made on the entire community by the generous co-operation of a large number of congregations.

The campaign will end on Tuesday evening with a dinner, to which all of the workers will be invited.

Y. W. C. A.'S EARLY FRIENDS.

Well-Known New Yorkers Counted Among Them.

As the campaign to raise $4,000,000 for a building fund for the Young Men's and Young Women's Christian Associations draws to a close it is interesting to note the famous old New Yorkers who gave the latter-Association its first start in this city. Way back in the last century, when Twenty-third Street was pretty well uptown, Thirty-fourth Street on the edge of things and Forty-second Street was the threshold of the open country, men whose names have become New York history were active in promoting the Young Women's Christian Association.

At that time the Y. W. C. A. of this city was the organization now known as the Central Branch, which has its home at 7 East Fifteen Street. There was ony the one association and it made the most of its field. Its first home was in a loft at 17 University Place. There it prospered so well that it soon required a larger building, so it rented the old Huyler residence at Eighteenth Street and Irving Place.

Even in those days the Y. W. C. A. was so progressive that after one year another move was necessary. A site was found at 7 East Fifteenth Street and the organization raised a fund to buy both the site and the building upon it, which it occupied. Later, it expanded still further with the result that it raised a much larger amount of money and put up its present building on the same site. Now it is to have a much larger and finer home for which $600,000 of the fund of $4,000,000 has been set aside.

Miss G. B. Ballard, Chairman of the Educational Committee of the Central Branch, who is at the head of the entire system of classes by which the branch is turning hundreds of New York girls into self-supporting young women, last night told some things about the New Yorkers who aided the organization in its infancy:

"Much assistance was given to us," said Miss Ballard, "by the family of the late James Stokes. Mr. Stokes's daughter at one time was President of the association when it was in its Fifteenth Street home. The association was incorporated in 1873, and although at first it had a hard struggle for existence, it soon enlisted the sympathies of leading men and women, so that the money necessary for the achievement of its purpose became increasingly easy to obtain.

"We were aided a great deal by William E. Dodge, the elder, whose daughter, Miss Grace H. Dodge, is now the head of our National Board. The Dodge family has done a great deal for the Y. W. C. A. One of its members who helped us largely is W. Earl Dodge, while Miss Elizabeth W. Dodge, niece of Miss Grace H. Dodge, is still another valueble ally.

"Then there was the late James Brown, the banker, head of the firm of Brown Brothers & Co. He was one of the earliest supporters of our organization. John Jacob Astor, uncle of the John Jacob who lost his life in the Titanic disaster, was another good friend. The late Morris K. Jesup was Chairman of our Advisory Board. William H. Caldwell also was a member of the board, and his assistance was tremendously useful.

"Did Alexander T. Stewart help the association much?" Miss Ballard was asked.

"No," she replied, "our cause did not seem to interest him greatly, although he made contributions to the Young Men's Christian Association. Mrs. Stewart, however, helped us, and I remember on one occasion she gave us $2,000.

"The Vanderbilts were interested in the Fifteenth Street Association," continued Miss Ballard. "Mrs. Elliott F. Shepard and her sisters, Mrs. William Douglas Sloane, Mrs. H. McK. Twombly, and Mrs. W. Seward Webb, all four daughters of the late William H. Vanderbilt, were ardent friends of the Y. W. C. A. in its early days as well as in later years. Mrs. Shepard was Vice President of the Central Branch.

"Mrs. D. H. McAlpin—I mean the second Mrs. McAlpin, because he married three times—took a great interest in our undertakings. Miss Olivia Stokes at one time was our President, and a very faithful worker. Mrs. William H. Crane, one of our Presidents in the old days, did a great deal to help us up the hill of prosperity.

"Francis Lynde Stetson was on our Advisory Board in the early days. Bishop Henry C. Potter, the elder; the Rev. Dr. Morgan Dix, rector of Old Trinity; the Rev. Dr. Rainsford, and most of the members of the Tiffany family helped, while Mr. Le Boutillier was one of our very good friends.

"Our work at first was instructing the girls in drawing, singing, sewing, and dressmaking, and later we added lessons in business, art, and sciences. We found a great many girls in the stores for our pupils when we began, and one of the first things we undertook was to get the large merchants to provide seats for their sales girls. Next we took up the question of getting big business men to give a weekly half-holiday to their girl employes.

"We had difficulty in getting hold of the girls at first," Miss Ballard continued, "because they were so unused to having any one outside their families take any interest in them that they looked upon us with some slight suspicion. We had to win them bit by bit, and it was hard work, but we triumphed in the end, and now they flock to us in large numbers.

"It was Mrs. Shepard, by the way, who established the Margaret Louisa Home. It was only transient guests that were accomodated there at first, but it was expanded later to meet the growing necessities of the times. The West Side and colored branches were offshoots of the original Y. W. C. A., and were built up as part of our extension work. When we started to establish our house in East Fifteenth Street we bought the site and paid for the ground, and then decided to wait until we got the entire fund we needed. In those times we raised money when we needed it, and it was done as a rule by visits to prominent business men. All in all, the Y. W. C. A. has been, and is now more than ever, a wonderful association. It is growing every day, and I predict that it will not be long before every New Yorker will recognize it as one of the finest factors in uplift work for girls."

THE GIRL OF TO-DAY IN CHRISTMAS TIMES

One Great Rotogravure Section Devoted Wholly to Her in the Holiday Number.

"THE PROPHETS" IN COLOR

Sargent's Famous Mural Painting Reproduced In Another Special Section — Out on Dec. 7.

The Christmas number of THE NEW YORK TIMES which will be issued on Sunday, Dec. 7, two weeks from to-day, will be in every respect a remarkable publication. Aside from the usual Sunday features, including the regular pictorial supplement, there will be two special sections, each of which represents the highest type of modern illustration. One will be in colors and the other will be printed by the rotogravure process, the newest method of photographic reproduction.

In the color section will be reproduced the famous mural paintings of John Singer Sargent, "The Prophets," which are one of the chief features of the interior of the Boston Public Library. These will be reproduced in the three original colors on special superpaper by the same process which we used when THE TIMES issued the late Edwin A. Abbey's "Holy Grail" and the Morgan pictures. The complete frieze as reproduced will be in three parts, 55 inches long and 10 inches wide, and will be suitable for framing.

The rotogravure section will be devoted to The Girl of To-day. It will contain twenty-nine of the photographs selected from the tremendous number of pictures sent in response to the invitation of THE TIMES as representative types of the American girl of to-day by the seven distinguished artists who acted as judges. The judges found it difficult to limit the number of pictures typical of the American girl to twenty-nine, so many types are there in this country, and they actually selected ninety, of which the first twenty-nine will appear in the Christmas section, and the remaining sixty-one in another special rotogravure section to be issued on Sunday, Dec. 14. The entire cover page of the special rotogravure section of the Christmas number will be given up to the picture selected by the jury of artists as best embodying their idea of The Girl of To-day.

Thus the Christmas number will include three distinctive pictoral sections, each of them representing the highest type of a modern method of the art of illustrating. This will be the first time that an eight-page rotogravure supplement has been published by an American newspaper, and it will introduce to the readers of THE TIMES the process which is going to be used by this newspaper in all its pictorial sections.

Rotogravure is an adaptation of the slow photogravure process which has long been used in the making of the expensive prints sold in art shops. The invention has made possible the quick reproduction of pictures so beautifully printed that only an expert can detect the difference between them and expensive prints. It was first used by THE TIMES in the reproduction of the photographs of President Wilson and the late Mayor Gaynor.

Sargent's frieze of "The Prophets" is part of the decoration of Sargent Hall, in the Boston Public Library. Sargent himself has described his complete scheme as representing "the triumph of religion—a mural decoration illustrating certain stages of Jewish and Christian history." In the frieze are the Hebrew prophets, scouring the idols of polytheism, and looking to the one and unseen God for their inspiration and law. The central figure is Moses, supporting the Tables of the Law, inscribed in Hebrew characters. As Moses is considered the ideal—almost superhuman—exponent of the divine will, he is treated with great conventionality. His priestly garment is arranged in formal folds, contrasting with the loose robes of the other prophets, and the golden wings of the Spirit, which enfold him, are intended to symbolize the authority of the spokesman of Jehovah. On the left is Joshua, who is sheathing his sword, and on the right is Elijah. To the right of Elijah are the prophets of despair, relieved by one phophet of hope, Hosea, while among the prophets of hope beyond Joshua is Micah, a prophet of despair. In the hands of Daniel is a scroll bearing in Hebrew words: "And they that be wise shall shine." Joshua bears a scroll inscribed "Jehovah."

Naturally, ever since the judges met and selected the photographs of typical American girls, and from them that of The Girl of To-day, there has been a great deal of speculation as to their choice. While it was not their object to pick out the prettiest pictures, but those which were typical of American girls, it has happened that the pictures they selected are all pretty. The result is that the special rotogravure section of the Christmas section is one that will not only delight the mechanical but the artistic eye as well.

Looking through the rotogravure section, one is struck by the variety of types of girls portrayed and harks back to what the experts who defined The Girl of To-day for THE TIMES said about her in their interviews. Some said she was the product of life in a great city, and that she was to be found only in New York. Others averred that it was the Middle West that was her habitat. Still others said she was to be found anywhere and everywhere in the United States. Of the twenty-nine in the special rotogravure section of the Christmas number a large percentage are New Yorkers, but the others show a wide latitude as to origin. There are four from New York State outside of New York City. Three are from as far away as California. One is from Massachusetts, three are from Pennsylvania, and the extreme South is represented by one from Louisiana.

The experts interviewed before the contest was decided held a variety of opinions as to the age of the typical girl of to-day. While marriage is not necessarily an indication of age, there are six married women among the twenty-nine, although it must be admitted that their looks indicate they are brides.

PLAN TUNNEL TO CAMDEN.

Project of Tube Under Delaware River at Philadelphia Revived.

PHILADELPHIA, Nov. 22.—Charter rights for the construction of a tunnel under the Delaware River from this city to Camden, N. J., were issued yesterday at Harrisburg to the Philadelphia Tunnel Railroad Company. It is expected that electric trains will be in operation beneath the river within two years.

The promoters attempted the building of such a tunnel several years ago. The charter is practically the renewal of their old franchise, the fulfillment of which was prevented by failure to obtain terminal facilities on the New Jersey side. The length of the tube with its approaches is to be less than one mile.

William A. Stern, President of the company, said: "We will begin work in about six months. Since there are no engineering difficulties to hinder the work, the tunnel should be completed within eighteen months after it is begun."

CHRISTMAS NUMBER OF THE TIMES.
The remarkable edition on Sunday, Dec. 7, will be sold out far ahead of time. Order it in advance, or you will be unable to get Sargent's "Prophets," reproduced in the original colors, and The Girl of To-day Section, illustrated by the new rotogravure process.—Adv.

NEW FIELDS OPEN TO COLLEGE WOMEN

Vocational Bureau Has Placed 400 Graduates Within Nineteen Months.

NEED TECHNICAL TRAINING

Undergraduates Urged to Use Vacations for That—Best Salaries Paid to Secretaries.

The first report of the Intercollegiate Bureau of Occupations, which was formed by the New York alumnae associations of the largest colleges for women in the East, shows that in the first nineteen months of its existence the organization has found positions for 400 college women or women with a training equal to a college education. These 400 positions have been found in sixty different occupations.

Another important work undertaken by the bureau has been that of advising women undergraduates what occupations were the most promising for college women and what special training is necessary. During the first nineteen months the bureau, by keeping in close touch with the women for which it has found positions, has laid the basis for research work which will show more exactly the advantages of the different fields which are open. This research work, as far as it has been advanced, leads Miss Mary Van Kleeck, President of the bureau, to the following conclusions concerning the vocational problems of college women:

"Our experience convinces us that in increasing numbers occupations other than teaching are open to college women.

"The college training, in itself, with the point of view and the background which it gives, is in demand in many vocations.

"On the other hand, some supplementary technical training is almost indispensable to fit a college woman for her occupation.

"As a natural result it is evident that more thought is needed in the planning of a career than many young college women realize. For many occupations the special technical training required does not take a long time. The suggestion that this might often be accomplished during the Summer vacations is a hopeful one for the college girl who wants to begin work as soon as she has her diploma in hand. Furthermore in some instances the college courses have a direct vocational bearing, if wisely chosen.

"Many positions could be more satisfactorily filled if they were expanded in scope to the advantage of employer and employe alike. To increase salary standards is vital, if these positions are to be made to yield larger returns not only to the worker but to the employer.

"For the educator, the employer and the worker, the urgent need is for fuller information about standards and conditions of employement as they are and as they ought to be."

One of the tables shows the great variety of occupations for which a special training is needed. Employers have come to the bureau to seek a librarian to index files of railway documents; a specialist in domestic science to edit school books; a farm manager to take charge of a rich social settlement. Young women who came to the bureau for employment found work as stenographers or secretaries, bookkeepers and office assistants, club leaders, teachers in new or unusual lines, house mothers, investigators, editors, and editorial assistants, executive managers, statisticians, organizers and lecturers.

Of the applicants placed in salaried positions 68.1 per cent. received $60 or more a month; a very few (1.7 per cent.) more than $150. In the four largest occupational groups—stenographers and secretaries, clerks, visitors, and settlement workers—several striking facts appear.

The salaries of stenographers and secretaries ranged from less than $30 to $200 a month. More than half received between $60 and $80, but 10.5 per cent. received between $100 and $200. None of the clerks and office assistants received $80 per month, and few received as much as $70. The value of stenography and typewriting in advancing young women to higher salaries is clearly indicated.

Miss Frances Cummings is manager of the bureau. The other officers are Miss Van Kleeck, President; Mrs. Wendell T. Bush, Vice President; Mrs. L. Frederic Pease, Secretary; Miss Antoinette Putnam-Cramer, Treasurer. The Directors are Miss Elizabeth Allen, Miss Alice C. Ames, Miss Elizabeth A. Ashburner, Mrs. George W. Bacon, Miss Margaret F. Byington, Miss Mary Vida Clark, Mrs. Henry P. de Forest, Mrs. George Endicott, Mrs. George S. Heliman, Miss Nancy McClelland, Miss Mabel F. Weeks, Miss Annie L. Pomeroy, Miss Eva S. Potter, Miss Bertha Rambaugh, Miss Julia Searing, Mrs. Stephen Searles, Mrs. H. M. Snevily, Miss Ethel Stebbins, Mrs. William A. Stewart, Miss Nellie L. Swartz, Mrs. Charlton Wallace.

FOR FRENCH STUDENTS.

Prizes Offered by Le Lyceum for Essays and Verse.

With prizes that include one for $100 and another for $50, Le Lyceum, a society of French women in New York, opens a literary contest to every one interested in the French language and literature. There are three subjects, one "The Influence of Jeanne d'Arc," either in French prose or French verse; one a story or epic recital on the Hudson, one a metrical translation of "Les Soveys et Les Pensées" from the "Guirlande de Julie." The first two must not be less than 300 words in length nor more than 800 words.

Manuscripts must be typewritten on one side of the page only and the motto system of anonymity must be used, with accompanying sealed envelope for the competitor's name. The competition is open until Jan. 31 and manuscripts should be sent to Mlle Helene de Nevelstein, 172 Washington Park, Brooklyn. Information may be obtained from Mme. Van Norman, 321 West Ninety-second Street.

This "Concours de Jeux Floraux" has among its patrons Gabriel Hanotaux of the Académie Française, Dr. John H. Finley, Prof. Adolphe Cohn of Columbia University, Edwin Markham, Mrs. Ella Wheeler Wilcox, Miss Elisabeth Marbury, Mrs. Simon Baruch, Miss Florence Guerhsey, Mrs. Samuel Kraemer, Mrs. Otto Kahn, and Enrico Caruso.

JAPAN SOCIETY'S PLANS.

Exhibition of Oriental Pottery to be Held—Now Has 950 Members.

The report of the Japan Society says that there are now 950 members on the roll, seventy-five being Japanese. The society works with a council of its members in Japan in furthering its object of interpreting Japan to the United States and the United States to Japan. It aims to co-operate with any and all existing agencies and bodies whose activities tend to promote a better understanding between the two countries. To encourage study of Japan and Japanese-American relations, the society last year offered cash prizes for the best essays or articles submitted by students of those subjects.

An exhibition of Japanese, Chinese and Korean pottery will be held under the auspices of the society from March 1 to 21, 1914, at Knoedler's Galleries, 556 Fifth Avenue. An authoritative catalogue, with color reproductions, will be issued. There will be exhibited about 300 selected examples of glazed antique pottery and the collection, it is said, will be the finest ever shown in one group. The Japan Society hopes at a later date to publish the results of important and extensive archaeological research work done in China and Korea by American and Oriental scholars.

TRAINING WOMEN TO BE CHAUFFEURS

Y. M. C. A.'s Experimental Class Developing Some Good Machinists and Drivers.

ALL WILL SEEK LICENSES

Some Wish to be Independent of Male Chauffeurs, but Others May Apply for Jobs.

The whirr of machinery, pounding, hammering, a roomful of mechanics working on disabled automobiles. But from under that huge engine peep buckled pumps; a fluffy yellow head is bending over this motor; some one is whistling Dvorak's "Humoresque" in a soft, womanish way. Can it be? But listen.

"Oh, dear, where's the wrench? Girls, girls, where is that wrench?"

A wild scrimmage.

"Oh, here, I had it in my pocket all the time. Aren't these big pockets lovely?"

Shish—rip!

"My new petticoat! I tore it on that horrid spike. Never wore it before. Oh, dear!"

"What a shame!"

"Too bad!"

"Let's see."

The scraping of tools and buzz of motors.

"I never will understand this radiator thing, but you should hear me talk radiators to my husband. He's quite awed."

"Lucy, what's this knob thing here? It doesn't poke or screw or turn, and I'm sure it isn't decorative."

"Charlie let me run the car last night right on Columbus Circle. I was scared to death, but he said I did it like a veteran. Isn't it fun?"

Licensed woman chauffeurs are the latest entrants into the world of feminine achievement. There have been woman motorists—intelligent folk who have learned to run cars under the watchful eye of James or Henry, and who, by means of goggles, veils, and similar technical accoutrement, have stamped themselves as intimates of the motor world. But the woman chauffeur, with her license, is distinctly a product of to-day. She is to be found at the West Side Y. M. C. A.

The authorities held out as long as possible under the storm of inquiry and indignation that accrued from the restriction of women from the automobile instruction course, for which 1,200 register every year. The women wrote, they telephoned, they called personally. They couldn't see why; they were dying to enter; must they become militant? There was a nurse who wanted to become an automobile demonstrator, her reason being that women would buy more readily from their own sex than they would from mere man. If her psychology was defective, her earnestness was tremendous. There was one of tender years who would drive a taxicab in the suffrage parade. There were others who wanted to be "independent" of chauffeurs, husbands, and like masculine despots. Finally the Y. M. C. A. weakened, and an experimental class was opened.

It proved to be an overwhelming success. Garbed in kitchen aprons and armed with grim determination six of New York's best feminists presented themselves for instruction in the manly art of chauffeuring. They passed a strenuous twelve weeks; hammering, cranking, wrenching, priming, pedaling; they studied the parts, they studied the whole; they put automobiles together, they took them apart, they drew them, they charted them, they cleaned them, they oiled them, and—they drove them! It was laborious, hot, dirty work, but the six stuck like Spartans, and emerged triumphant, the light of success in their eyes.

The skeptical instructors were surprised at the progress of their fair pupils; the women were amazingly quick and soon got ahead of the lessons. On the road the instructor often found himself on the back seat, while two self-sufficient women in front "showed how."

In teaching men an instructor takes only one pupil at a time, but since wheel manipulation requires that the teacher put his arm around the pupil, the women applied the old maxim about safety and numbers, and went out two by two.

At the expiration of the course the recruits went their several ways. Three heroic girls got licenses. But the nurse couldn't get a position, so she had to go back to nursing, and the one of tender years had to abandon the parade idea on account of parental objection.

As a result of the experimental class, however, the course has now been thrown open to women, and last week the first classes were held. In grimy shop rooms with machinery and tools, they gather on Monday and Thursday mornings to study the mysteries of the motor car. Driving lessons are given in conjunction with shop work. Each automobile is equipped with an extra set of pedals for the instructor, so that accidents are impossible. At driving women are a great deal more apt than men, the instructors say, because of their greater sensitivity of touch and because they do not try to make strength answer for skill.

One pupil in the new class was asked why she was taking the course.

"To save my husband the dirty work," was the reply, "and to drive him to the office. Well, you needn't laugh. He works harder than I do, and I'm big and strong."

"Well, I'm not," declared another, "but I am tired of sitting around, waiting for people to take me where I want to go. They'll have to ask me hereafter, and, if it's convenient, I'll probably condescend."

"Here, too," agreed a third. "My son has gone to college, and I'm perfectly helpless about that car. Won't he be surprised at Thanksgiving, when I ask him to go driving with me?"

"Ladies," comes the voice of the instructor, "there are repairs to be made on Cars 3, 6, and 8. Will you kindly get them in order?"

Chattering about carburetors, spark plugs, and clutches, they descend into the shop.

"Oh, here's one with a wheel off! I love to put on wheels."

A scramble for tools.

"What's the matter, Miss Strong?"

"Something about the engine," comes in muffled tones from under the car, "but I can't find it."

Hammering, sighing, hard breathing, wriggling under cars, climbing over them. Then:

"Oh! it's only out of gasoline. I'm so disappointed. I hoped there was something terrible the matter."

"Regular ones, eh?" grinned a mechanic to the janitor in the next room.

"Regular ones," agreed the janitor.

SUES METAL PRODUCTS CO.

Sales Manager Gets an Attachment for $12,000 Against It.

An attachment for $12,000 in favor of T. J. Norton against the United States Metal Products Company was filed in the office of Sheriff George Emener of Queens County yesterday. Norton alleges that he was engaged as sales manager by the company with a drawing account of $50 a week and 5 per cent. commission, to be settled every six months. He says that the $12,000 became due on Oct. 19.

Several days ago an attachment for $75,000 obtained by the Chase National Bank of Manhattan was filed against the company, and, according to Sheriff Emener, is still pending, although the creditors, it is understood, have expressed a willingness to grant the company an extension of six months in which to effect a settlement.

FOUGHT GROCERS' COMBINE

Politics Touch Home Questions—Women Lawmakers Can Give Home Point of View.

"Every city in every State in the country is in need of motherliness," said Senator Helen Ring Robinson of Colorado before the League for Political Education at the Hudson Theatre yesterday morning in telling her audience that it was the womanly woman who was needed in politics, not a creature recreated in the image of man.

"They say of a woman sometimes that 'She thinks like a man,'" continued Senator Robinson. "They think it is a compliment, but I never could see the reason why. A woman like that is not essentially the kind of a woman needed for political work. To have a man at one desk in the Legislature and a woman at another does not mean simply that the vote is going to be doubled.

"I took to the Legislature the spirit of the housekeeper and the homemaker. It is not only the farmers, the doctors, and the railroads who have representatives there. The grocer has his representative, too; and I can tell you that the housewives in Colorado are very glad that they have their representative to watch him. A man representing the grocer's combine said he would like to know the reason why, after all his work, his bill didn't get through.

"I don't mind saying—it is so long ago now, and I am so far from home—that I was one of the reasons why his bill didn't go through.

"Why, I do fully one-half of my housekeeping at the polls. A great deal of your housekeeping is done in the City Council, behind which is the State Legislature. How about the streets and the garbage cans and so many things which have direct connection with the home life?

"A garbage can is a galvanized iron can entirely surrounded by politics.

"Some of the women want to leave all these things to the men, who have always been proverbially careless housekeepers. Business interests get along very well in the hands of men, but women are more interested in persons. Laws will not get by a woman without her seeing how they will affect the individual."

Speaking of the objections made to women in politics, Mrs. Robinson said: "There were objections made in the days of the cave dwellers to the women, who wanted change. The men in those days used to knock the women they wished for wives on the head and carry them off. Then when the women rose up and said they thought gentler methods would be better, the men said they were unwomanly.

"There is a man in Hartford who says women should not be in the Legislature, and gives as a reason that they never have been there. He says that the fact that there is only one woman to thirty-four men in the Colorado Senate proves that a woman shouldn't be there. That is very illogical, of course, but I give such a man an illogical answer.

"I ask him what inference he would draw as to the general fitness of women from the fact that in another Colorado institution the men predominate much more largely than in the Senate. In the State Penitentiary there are 803 men and only 87 women."

Mrs. Robinson has been called the first woman Senator, but she explained yesterday that she had discovered recently that this was a mistake.

"In earlier days in Utah," she said, "when plural wives were given up, there was a man named Cannon—I don't know his other name—who was obliged to put away his plural wife, Martha Cannon. He ran for the Legislature shortly after that and so did Martha. And he lost and Martha won, and she was the first woman Senator in the United States."

END OF BEDFORD ST. CHURCH

Services to be Held There To-day for the Last Time.

Final services will be held to-day in the historic Bedford Street Methodist Church, one of the landmarks of old Greenwich Village, at Morton and Bedford Streets. The church building stands directly in the line of the Seventh Avenue extension from Eleventh Street south to Varick Street, and the property was acquired by the city early in September. The congregation received notive to vacate a short time ago, and within a few weeks the old church which was erected in 1840 will be torn down. The building replaced a wooden structure built on the same site in 1810, but the founding of the church dates from 1805.

The Trustees have approved a plan to consolidate with the Metropolitan Temple at Seventh Avenue and Fourteenth Street, and the Rev. George W. Downes, pastor of the Bedford Street Church, will become associated in the pastorate of the Metropolitan Temple with the Rev. Arthur Bruce Moss.

The services to-day will be of a varied and reminiscent character. The Rev. Dr. F. Watson Hannan of Drew Theological Seminary will be the preacher at the morning service, and the last service this evening will be conducted by the Rev. Dr. Allan MacRossie, Superintendent of the New York division. The feature of the afternoon will be an old-time experience meeting led by Nicholas Onderdonk, the oldest member of the church, who joined sixty-six years ago. There are fifteen members who have been connected with the Bedford Street Church for more than fifty years, and they will all be present.

Closing services were held every night during the past week, and one of the most interesting was the Bedford Street Association dinner held in the church hall on Friday. It was attended by more than 200 persons, including many former members who moved away from the locality years ago.

Unruly Pupils Cause Her Suicide.

BROCKTON, Mass., Nov. 22.—Despondency because of difficulty in handling unruly pupils is believed to have been the cause of the suicide by gas today of Miss Carrie E. Stoddard, a public school teacher. She was 22 years old.

OLD CANNON BALL TELLS STORY OF '75

Dug Up in Equitable Building Site, It Was First a Capture from the British.

TULIP GROWER HELD IT

Jacobus Stoutenburgh Had to Defend His Position as Custodian of Arms at City Hall.

While working forty feet underground near the Broadway and Pine Street corner of the excavation for the new Equitable Building last Thursday, a workman dug up an old four-inch cast iron cannon ball evidently buried since revolutionary days.

At the offices of the Thompson-Starrett Company who are erecting the Equitable Building, it was said that the old records of the time seem to show with considerable clearness not only how the cannon ball came to be there but also who the probable owners were.

In June of 1775 Col. Marinus Willett captured a quantity of arms and ammunition from the British at Broadway and Beaver Street. This was loaded on carts, taken up Broadway, and dumped in the vacant lot at the northwest corner of Broadway and John Street, in which lot Abraham Van Dyk han an open-air bowling alley. It is not known how long they remained there, but it is supposed it was only for a short time and that they later became a part of a collection placed under the care of Jacobus Stoutenburgh in the City Hall.

A few months later, in September, 1775, complaints were made that the arms and ammunition were being removed without permission from the City Hall and Jacobus Stoutenburg was moved to defend his position as custodian in an affidavit made on Sept. 6, 1775, to the Common Council which read as follows:

I, Jacobus Stoutenburgh, do hereby certify that there were 522 musquets belonging to the Corporation of the City of New York and under my care in the City Hall when the account of the Lexington Battle arrived and were taken away from thence by sundry persons, together with their several accoutrements. And I do further certify that 28 musquets more which also belonged to the Corporation and were given to Mr. Isaac Stoutenburgh to clean, etc., were taken away from him..... and at the same time, 6 iron bulet molds were also taken away from the City Hall.

JACOBUS STOUTENBURGH.

W. H. Lockwood, in charge of the old records of the Title Guarantee and Trust Company, said yesterday that as early as 1749 the Stoutenburgh family owned a considerable portion of the present Equitable site. A part of their property covered the corner of Nassau Street—then called Kipp Street or Smith Street—and Pine Street, which was then known as King Street.

The plot measured 70 feet on Nassau Street and 80 feet on Pine Street. In addition to this, they owned a strip that had a 38-foot frontage on Broadway on the same site. This part was devoted to a garden in which tulips were raised of such fine quality as to attain much celebrity.

FILIPINOS ORGANIZE CLUB.

From Quarters in Brooklyn It Will Work for Philippine Autonomy.

The Filipinos of this city, including students of that nationality at Columbia, Fordham, and Pratt Institute, last night organized "El Club Progreso Filipino," (the Filipino Progressive Club,) to answer the charges made by Dean Worcester, ex-Secretary of the Interior, and to advocate the independence and neutralization of the Philippine Islands.

The headquarters of the club is at 177 Nassau Street, Brooklyn, where 150 members were enrolled last night, 100 of whom are serving in the United States Navy. Zacarios Gomez was elected President and A. Anson Secretary.

Augustin Rodriguez, proprietor of the Manila House, at 194 Sands Street, Brooklyn, stands ready to give the necessary financial backing for the promulgation of the cause, and José A. Manibo will be Chairman of the meetings at which Philippine politics are discussed.

Señor Manibo was formerly editor of The Philippine Review, a monthly political journal published by the Filipinos in Brooklyn. He has studied constitutional law and political science at Washington University, Seattle, and later went to Ohio State University to continue his legal studies. The first meeting of the club will be held this week.

NEW MONTEFIORE HOME.

Patients Transferred Safely—Buildings to be Shown Next Sunday.

The patients of the Montefiore Home are now housed in the spacious new buildings recently completed at Jerome Avenue, Gun Hill Road and 210th Street. The transfer of the patients, including nearly 300 with incurable ailments, was accomplished without mishap. Practically every available ambulance from the hospitals of the city was placed at the disposal of the Montefiore Home, and these, together with numerous automobiles, most of which were furnished by Directors of the institution, transferred the patients.

The removal began at 7 o'clock in the morning, and by 11 o'clock of the same morning every patient was safely transferred with no apparent injury to any one of them.

The new buildings of the Montefiore Home are of the most approved construction. The Directors will hold a reception on the occasion of the annual meetings of the members and subscribers on next Sunday, Nov. 30, invitations for which have already been sent out. The Directors will have charge of the buildings on that day and will conduct visitors through the institution and explain all matters of interest.

MURPHY CANCELS VACATION PLANS

Tammany's Schemes to Defeat Reorganizers Keep "the Chief" in Town.

DECOY CLUBS SPRING UP

Calling Themselves Inside Reformers —Glynn's Attitude Toward Whitman a Factor.

If there is to be a reorganization of Tammany Hall from the inside, or if a fight from the outside is to be made upon the organization by Independent Democrats who hope to displace Tammany, Charles F. Murphy intends to know all about it, and he prepared to make a fight of his own. Mr. Murphy postponed indefinitely yesterday his long-planned trip to Hot Springs, Va., in order to be on the ground and lead in person his fight upon the anti-Tammany forces.

In the meantime Mr. Murphy and his Tammany advisers have not been inactive. In the two Assembly districts, the Nineteenth and the Twenty-third, where the fight against Tammany is gaining greatest headway, a counter attack has already been started by Mr. Murphy. In these two districts so-called anti-Tammany organizations have been started, but it was said yesterday that their object would be to protect Tammany as much as possible by drawing the fire from the bona-fide anti-Tammany organizations that have already been put in the field.

In the Nineteenth District the Samuel J. Tilden Democratic Club, which was organized by Richard E. Weldon, has been actively trying to get together all of the forces opposed to Tammany. Several meetings have been held and a programme to fight Tammany from the inside has been started. At the same time, it became known yesterday, another Democratic Club has been started there by E. P. Kilroe and J. A. McDonald, a son-in-law of United States Senator James A. O'Gorman. No name has been bestowed upon this new club as yet, and its plans have been kept more or less secret. About all that is known about it is that it has announced its principles to be "a thorough house-cleaning of Tammany Hall from the inside with newer and better leaders and a short ballot."

This organization, it was said yesterday, was really started by friends of Mr. Murphy who hope to annex the Samuel J. Tilden Democratic Club, and thus foil any attempt to have it make a vigorous fight upon the Fourteenth Street organization.

In the Twenty-third District the Cleveland Democracy has started out to make an energetic fight against Tammany. This organization was started by County Clerk William F. Schneider, and assisting him are Deputy County Clerks Nat D. Jacoby and W. B. Selden and John F. Cowan, Commissioner of Records. They have appointed a committee to work with other anti-Tammany organizations in other districts, and Mr. Jacoby said yesterday that such organizations had been started in eighteen Assembly districts in Manhattan and in the Bronx and Richmond.

To offset the activities of this organization friends of Tammany have organized one of their own with the ostensible purpose of displacing Tammany, but in reality to help Tammany as much as possible. This new club has been organized by Edmund Hurley, a lawyer of 233 Broadway, and William H. O'Gorman, a broker of 44 Pine Street, who is said to be a relative of Senator O'Gorman. Like the organization in the Nineteenth District, this organization also has no name as yet, but its platform is "a thorough housecleaning of Tammany Hall from the inside, newer and better leaders, and the short ballot." The fact that both organizations are mysterious affairs and both profess the same principles has convinced the bona fide anti-Tammany workers that they were organized for the special purpose of offsetting whatever work is done by the Samuel J. Tilden Democratic Club and the Cleveland Democracy.

Evidence that Tammany is also planning to play a deeper game in an effort to offset the investigations being conducted by District Attorney Whitman into Tammany graft was also forthcoming yesterday. The fact that Gov. Martin H. Glynn has appointed James W. Osborne a special Deputy Attorney General to delve into State canal and highway graft was considered highly significant by local politicians yesterday. Tammany leaders say that District Attorney Whitman's activities have purely a political significance; that he hopes to keep himself to the front as a possible Gubernatorial candidate. Friends of Gov. Glynn said yesterday that the Governor was convinced that the District Attorney was going beyond his jurisdiction in conducting a State-wide graft inquiry in his John Doe proceedings; that he should confine his activities solely to New York County and that it should be left to the Attorney General to inve tigate matters in up-State counties.

Mr. Osborne's investigation, when it gets under way, said local politicians yesterday, would take the wind completely out of the District Attorney's sails. Mr. Osborne as a special Deputy Attorney General will have wide power, and will be able to reach individuals over whom Mr. Whitman has no power whatever. In other words, Gov. Glynn, it was pointed out, intends that a Republican District Attorney of New York County shall not be able to make a State-wide reputation that might stand him in good stead next year, and that if any credit is to ensue because of the investigations it shall go entirely to the Democratic Party. It was hinted in some quarters that Mr. Osborne might confine himself largely to investigations of Republican activities.

To offset the Governor's plan, it became known yesterday that the Republican State organization might take an active part. It was said that Chairman William Barnes intended to have the next Assembly, which will have a working Republican majority, start an investigation of its own.

An Assembly commission, it was said, might be appointed early next year to meet in New York City and follow up the lines of activity started by District Attorney Whitman. This commission, it was pointed out, would have Statewide power also, and would work in harmony with Mr. Whitman. When the Republican leaders meet in this city on Dec. 5 it is expected that they will take up this proposition of an Assembly commission.

Whatever happens, Charles F. Murphy intends to take an active part in the proceedings. Shortly before the last election Mr. Murphy had engaged rooms at the Homestead Hotel in Hot Springs, and intended leaving the week after election to spend a vacation. Instead Mr. Murphy will remain at Good Ground and come to the city several times a week and keep in close touch with proceedings in this city and at Albany.

YOUNG REPUBLICAN DINNER.

Mayor Kline and Mayor-Elect Mitchel Among Those Invited.

The New York Young Republican Club will give a dinner at the Astor on Dec. 12. Henry W. Goddard is Chairman of the Dinner Committee. Among those who have accepted invitations to attend the feast are Mayor Ardolph Kline, Mayor-elect John Purroy Mitchel, President-elect of the Board of Aldermen George McAneny, Controller William A. Prendergast, President-elect of the Borough of Manhattan Marcus M. Marks, County Chairman Samuel S. Koenig, Register-elect John J. Hopper, County Clerk William F. Schneider, Sheriff-elect Max S. Grifenhagen, Judge William H. Wadhams, Eugene A. Philbin, Coroners-elect Israel L. Feinberg, Herman Hellenstein, and P. D. Riordan.

Among the speakers will be Mayor Kline, Mayor-elect Mitchel, President-elect of the Board of Aldermen McAneny, President-elect of the Borough of Manhattan Marcus M. Marks, Controller Prendergast, and County Chairman Samuel S. Koenig.

GET TYSON & CO. TICKETS.

Nearly 200 Patrons Obtain Their Long Held-Up Opera Books.

Nearly 200 persons went yesterday to the main offices of Tyson & Co., 1,122 Broadway, where, without further trouble, they obtained their Metropolitan Opera tickets, held for more than two months by the Metropolitan Trust Company of 49 Wall Street, as collateral on a loan to the ticket agency. When Tyson & Co. closed its offices last night only a few of the books of tickets had not been called for. There were not as many as two dozen tickets for to-morrow night still on the shelves in the ticket agency's offices.

The season tickets for the Metropolitan Opera House were turned over to Tyson & Co. by the Metropolitan Trust Company following an arrangement effected by counsel for the trust company and for the ticket agency. The terms of that agreement, releasing the tickets, as yet have not been ascertained, but it was thought significant that the solution of the tangle was reached within a very short time after the District Attorney's office announced that the tickets when paid for by the subscribers, became the "absolute property of the purchasers," and that "any disposal of those tickets other than their immediate delivery to the purchasers was illegal and criminal."

The hearing on the complaint of Adoph E. Dick of 244 West Seventieth Street, who charges that Tyson & Co. misappropriated his season tickets and the money he paid for them, will be resumed to-morrow afternoon at 2 o'clock before Magistrate Deuel, sitting by designation in the Criminal Courts Building. Assistant District Attorney Train, who has conducted the examination of witnesses, has rested the case for the State, but William L. Marshall of Griggs, Baldwin & Baldwin, counsel for Tyson & Co., hopes to introduce additional evidence to show more completely all the transactions leading up to the ticket tangle.

Bertram Cruger, Treasurer of the Metropolitan Trust Company, visited the offices of Tyson & Co. during the afternoon. Mr. Cruger did not explain his mission there.

To the Central Fusion Committee of Queens the Citizens' Municipal League gave $1,500, Ogden Mills $1,000, and Lawrence B. Halleran $2,000.

Gaynor Fusion League.

The Mayor Gaynor Fusion and Nominating League received $8,536 and expended $8,750. The larger of the contributions were from Jacob H. Schiff and Henry Clews, each $2,500; Herman Ridder and Irving T. Bush, each $1,000; Isaac Guggenheim and John D. Crimmins, each $250; E. J. Greenhut, $200; Henry Siegel, Samuel Adams, William Harman Black, Arnold B. Heine, John Adikes, John Condon, and R. Ross Appleton, each $100.

The City Economy League of New York, Louis V. Bright Treasurer, gathered $8,410 and expended $7,625. The total liabilities, however, above cash on hand and $75 in contributions still owing, are $283.17. Those who contributed the larger sums were: W. H. Chesebrough, $1,000; Allied Real Estate Interests, Oakleigh Thorne, and T. Coleman du Pont, each $500.

The Cleveland Democracy of the City of New York, Charles W. Schluter Treasurer, reports receipts of $2,065 and expenditures of $1,725. The largest contributors were: J. F. Cowan, $400; W. B. Selden, $200, and R. H. Smith, $250.

CITY COVETED PARK ROW.

Old Letter Shows More Park Space Was Desired in 1820.

An interesting fact of almost forgotten New York history is revealed in an autograph letter of Edmund Simpson, one of the managers of the famous Park Theatre, which will be sold this week in the Douglas Taylor collection of theatrical material at the Anderson Auction Galleries. It shows that in 1820 the city was considering the question of enlarging City Hall Park by purchasing additional land on Park Row, opposite that portion of the park now occupied by the inartistic Post Office Building.

It appears from the letter that the question of enlarging the park had risen immediately after the burning of the old Park Theatre, which occupied an eighty-foot frontage at 21 to 25 Park Row, just above the present Park Row Building. The old house was burned in May, 1820, but John Jacob Astor and John K. Beekman, who owned the property, began rebuilding at once, and the new Park Theatre was ready for opening in September, 1821. Mr. Simpson's letter was written to T. Phillips, an English actor, who made two visits to America. It is dated Dec. 7, 1820.

"The proprietors, Beekman and Astor," he writes, "are going on with the theatre, but I expect the Corporation will buy it and take it down for the purpose of enlarging the Park. If they do we shall go on immediately with our building. If the Corporation do not buy it, we shall either be leaseholders or build another and till it is settled either one way or the other we shall play in the little theatre where we are now and which I can assure you we have made very comfortable."

There was, then, a "little theatre" in 1820. It was on Worth Street, near Broadway, and was leased by Price & Simpson, the managers of the Park Theatre after the Park was burned. In his letter Mr. Simpson, who was an actor as well as one of the managers, speaks about his loss in the fire, saying that it carried off all the theatrical property he owned except "a pair of silk stockings which I had lent and the person to whom they were lent had taken them home."

Edmund Kean was playing in the little Worth Street theatre at the time, under the Price & Simpson management, and it was in that house, known as the Anthony Street Theatre—for the name of the street was not changed until several years later—that the eminent English tragedian made his first appearance in this country, on Oct. 29, 1820. In speaking of his success Mr. Simpson in his newsy letter says:

"Kean is with us and playing to great business, he averages about $1,000. a night. The people don't know exactly what to make of him. His strange manner surprises them, but his style gains converts every night and before he leaves us I expect they will be unanimous in calling him, as they express it, the greatest creation they ever saw."

$500 FOR RETURN OF STAMP.

Five Rare United States Specimens Stolen at Exhibition.

A reward of $500, "and no questions asked," is offered by Clarence E. Chapman of the firm of Chapman & Ballard, 2 Wall Street, for the return of the five rare United States stamps that were stolen from his collection at the International Philatelic Exhibition in the Engineering Societies building, 25-33 West Thirty-ninth Street, on the evening of Nov. 1.

It was the last day of the big stamp show, which, until that time, had been conducted without a hitch of any kind. The hundreds of thousands of stamps had been publicly displayed daily from 10 A. M. to 10 P. M. without the loss of a single specimen or any attempt to steal one.

The moment chosen for the theft was in the lull of the dinner hour. The closing day's crowd, the largest of any day of the exhibition, had temporarily thinned out. The thief, who is believed to be a professional, evidently had been waiting this opportunity. He presumably had moved about with the sightseers and had overheard comments about the rarity of these particular stamps.

They were of the inverted variety of the 1869 issue, and consisted of one 15 cents, two 24 cents, and two 30 cents denominations, and were printed in various colors, the 15 cents in blue and brown, the 24 cents in green and dark violet, the 30 cents in red and blue.

Two plates were used in printing them, each of a different color. By an error a sheet of each of these stamps was misprinted, one of the plates in each instance being upside down when it entered the rollers. The 15 and 24 errors have inverted medallions, the 30 cent, inverted flags.

The value of these five stamps, which are unusually fine specimens, has been reckoned as high as $5,000, but a more moderate estimate rates them from $2,000 to $2,500. When Mr. Chapman, who lives at Oakland, N. J., was informed by telephone of his misfortune he said it was indeed a great loss to him. His collection was fully insured by Lloyds, he said, but it was not the money value of his stamps he wanted, but the stamps themselves.

Miss Willis of Flushing, N. Y., believes she saw the thief a short time before he stole the stamps. He hung so long around the frame in which they were exhibited that she became uneasy, thinking that he might be a detective who was watching her as a suspect. Several Pinkerton men were on guard at the door to the exhibition, but the thief passed them unsuspected with the small card, to which the stamps were attached, under his coat.

The theft was effected by withdrawing the small nails that held in place the matting at the back of the frame and then reaching down and extracting the small tack that held in place the card to which the five stamps were attached.

A few days after the loss it was thought that the thief had been discovered and would return the stamps if he were promised immunity. Investigation, however, showed that the information came from an irresponsible person, and then Mr. Chapman decided to offer the $500 reward.

Two in Irons for Mutiny.

MOBILE, Ala., Nov. 22.—Accused of mutiny and attempting to incite other members of the crew, two stokers on the Austrian Steamer Bohome, were put in irons when the vessel reached here from Rio Janeiro late last night. Many of the sailors were said to have been kept under armed surveillance the greater part of the voyage. The disaffection was said to be due to complaints that rations were short.

Supreme Justices at Negro's Funeral

WASHINGTON, Nov. 22.—Five members of the United States Supreme Court, including Chief Justice White, crowded into a humble little home in Washington to-day to attend the funeral of Archie Lewis, the negro messenger who had taken care care of their robes ever since they were elevated to the bench. Lewis was serving the court when Justices Day, Van Devanter and Lamar, were born, and before Chief Justice White and Justice Holmes had started to school.

HANLEY OF HARNEY LAUDS HIS STATE

Prosperous Oregon Cattle Man Says Greatest Opportunity Is in the Soil.

BIG PRICES IN FAR WEST

Farmers Own Automobiles and Farm Girls and Boys Go to Agricultural Colleges.

William Hanley, pioneer, philosopher, and one of the most prosperous and influential men of Oregon, arrived at the Waldorf yesterday. Out on the Pacific Coast if you don't know Bill Hanley of Harney County, Ore., you confess yourself unknown. Mr. Hanley describes himself as a plain man, but he is known to be mighty substantial. Much of his life has been spent in what is still almost a wilderness, and it was only three or four years ago that he discovered New York. Since then he has made a visit to the East about this time every year.

When Mr. Hanley first came here, he told a reporter, he had to drive his cattle 250 miles to get to the nearest railway station. In those few years things have progressed in Oregon to such an extent that Mr. Hanley's steers now only have to walk a little matter of 100 miles to catch a train for Chicago. Had it not been for the Government and a portion of the public getting so enthusiastic on the subject of regulation, Mr. Hanley says that he and his fellow-citizens of Central Oregon would have had two lines of railroad running through their country by this time.

"What makes it hard for us away out there," complained Mr. Hanley yesterday, "is that the end of this country that is finished is trying to do the regulating, while we are simply trying to construct. It is hard for railways to get money for new work. The general tension of this regulating process chills new construction. Both of the roads that are building into our country have managed to get only about half the money they need to complete the work they have undertaken. They are still outside our county, which is considerably larger than some of your Eastern States.

"Another great burden we have out there is the extreme idea of conservation that seems to be so popular this part of the country. Where immense material resources are located there is no population, because a population uses the resources. In our State 51 per cent. of the land has been withdrawn by the Government, and, after all, there is not so much left to the people. Wherever there are timber and water the Government has put up a 'Keep off' sign. Our natural resources are being held for 'all the people,' and all the people care in the least."

Mr. Hanley raises cattle on 200,000 acres. He says that the problem of the high cost of living will not be solved until more people in the city own country land and know something about what it should produce and how to produce.

"The cattle business is only a matter of raising the cattle and sitting still," confided Mr. Hanley in answer to a question. "And, I might add, not to take too much time counting the awful price we have to pay to keep still. The price we are getting for cattle to-day is so much more than we used to expect as cattle raisers that it seems extravagant just to take the money. Why we are now selling for over $100 apiece steers such as twenty years ago we would have had a lot of trouble getting $12 for."

"But do they not cost you a lot more to raise?"

"Everything costs more when you get money," remarked Mr. Hanley sagely. "We all try to look more thrifty when things are better. In my opinion, people have something to be alarmed over in this country. The great increase of consumers and the decrease of producers is one of our greatest weaknesses. Now, in Oregon more people have gone into raising cattle these last few years, but city-raised people are disqualified in a way for pioneering.

"As a matter of fact, when there were free ranges the cattleman never got the benefit of them. He just thought he did. The big butcher simply adjusted conditions at the time he was coming into power so that he and the consumer got the profit coming from free ranges. It worked a good deal like the case of the farmer who thinks when his crops get a fine rain in the Spring that it is his rain. Then another man gets up with a piece of chalk and marks off the profit within twenty-four hours, and the farmer finds the rain didn't belong to him at all.

"The State of Oregon lately has gone in a great deal for developing by putting up to the agricultural college the responsibility for the success of the farmers of the State. Demonstration farms, short courses in agriculture, and traveling experts have had great results. Farming is cattle raising and cattle raising is farming nowadays. Meat producing is no longer a free-range business. Food for cattle has to be grown.

"The great opportunity nowadays is in the country, and not in the city. There is no question but that we should be able to meet any local demand for beef and farm products in this country, and at reasonable cost, if the same amount of interest were turned to that line of endeavor that has been turned to other lines that have done so well in this country. There is still plenty of land to be had in Oregon at from $5 to $30 an acre. Harney County alone has about 4,000,000 acres open to homestead. People can come in and take it up under the Government land law. The enlarged homesteads of 320 acres are now based on a cultivation of crops, not upon living on the land, which is fairer.'

"I came on to attend the Conservation Congress at Washington," said Mr Henley, in answer to a question. "In Oregon we are feeling grieved that we should have our resources tied up against development and lose the use of the whole State for population. There is much feeling on the subject. We feel that it is a natural way for the Government to raise revenue, but if so employed, the burden should fall on all the States, not merely upon those where the resources have been tied up. Our feeling is that we ought to have a Government for the people, not a Government to operate property. When the Government has a right both to tax and regulate, it ought to make a corporation which is not serving the people look mighty small when it squeezes the two ends together.

"As for the policy of President Wilson in regard to Mexico, I don't think people out our way are any better guessers than you are here. We don't want to take Mexico, and we don't want war if it can possibly be avoided. One thing might give our altruists something to think about, and that is that a Government can be no better than the people that produce it."

"The people in Oregon," said Mr. Henley, "are very happy just now because they are getting big prices for all their products. Those who have worked long enough, now have automobiles and all the modern luxuries, and those that haven't feel that they soon will have such things. Most of the farm boys and girls are taking courses in agriculture or domestic science, and expect to go back to the farm.

"If we are going to keep up the kind of Government we have now, we have got to have a condition of distribution between country life and city life, and a bigger percentage of people in this country must own pieces of the country. People who live in cities must own property in the country and have a knowledge of how to make a living off it. Transportation is a big equalizer of sentiment. Nobody is any farther away from a place than the time it takes to go there, and home is really only a place where you can make a living.

"The old fireside," said Mr. Henley, "is mighty chilly when you haven't the wherewithall to keep a fire in it."

HITS WHIPPING POST AGAIN.

Representative Evans Insists Delaware Lashings Are Degrading.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 22.—Representative Evans of Montana again condemned the Delaware whipping post in a speech in the House to-day. Mr. Evans spoke in response to the remarks of Representative Brockson of Delaware, who several days ago defended the whipping post and challenged the contention that the Federal Government might have power to enjoin the continuance of this kind of punishment. Attorney General McReynolds has ruled that the prohibition in the Federal Constitution against the infliction of "cruel and unusual punishment" does not extend to the States.

"I am perfectly willing to abide by the decision of the Attorney General," said Mr. Evans, "although I feel that somewhere, at some time, a remedy will be found that will forever put a stop to the practice of the courts of Delaware.

"Why is a woman not flogged in Delaware? The answer comes back immediately: To flog a woman would be cruel, so cruel that the good citizens of Delaware would not permit it. All of which appears to me to prove that corporal punishment as inflicted in the great State of Delaware is cruel and in direct violation of the best sentiments of the country."

Mr. Evans said he had been deluged with letters from all ports of the country in condemnation of the whipping post.

"To resort to the whipping post is simply a 'call of the wild.' It degrades the helpless victim, the man who applies the lash, the mob who look upon the crime, and the State or nation that sits idly by and does nothing to prevent its commission."

CAPT. H. B. WEST SUSPENDED

Revenue Cutter Commander Held Guilty of Neglect of Duty.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 22.—Capt. Horace B. West of the United States Revenue Cutter Service was to-day sentenced to suspension for six months from duty on half pay and to be publicly reprimanded for neglect of duty. This, the verdict of a court-martial, was approved by Byron Newton, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

Capt. West was in command of the revenue cutter Pamlico, with station at Newbern, N. C., when he was tried on charges of neglect of duty, conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman, and violating lawful regulations issued by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The court found Capt. West guilty of "neglect of duty" and "violating regulations," and acquitted him of the charge of "conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman."

"The charges," said Mr. Newton in a statement, "involved neglects, failure, and derelictions of duty on Capt. West's part in the conduct of the official correspondence of the revenue cutter Pamlico, while in command of that vessel. The specifications of the charges alleged in substance his neglects and failures to make reply to several reports and communications transmitted to him from the Treasury Department on official matter relating to the Revenue Cutter Service until a considerable time had elapsed after their receipt."

PLEA BY WANAMAKER.

Merchant Appears Before McReynolds in Customs Case.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 22.—Interest in the criminal aspect of the charges of undervaluation of customs, made against John Wanamaker in the closing days of the Taft Administration, was revived to-day when Mr. Wanamaker appeared before Attorney General McReynolds and argued against further prosecution of the case. Mr. Wanamaker had compromised with the Government by paying $100,000 into the Treasury.

When Attorney General Wickersham accepted the compromise it was with the distinct understanding that the right to bring criminal indictment was reserved. There was much adverse comment at the time against the Taft Administration for not pressing the case further, and there have been indications for some months that Mr. McReynolds intended to look into every phase of the transaction before letting the subject drop.

Mr. Wanamaker was accompanied by Henry A. Wise of New York, his counsel, who gained wide experience in customs cases when he was United States District Attorney for the Southern District of New York.

The department refused to state what sort of impression Mr. Wanamaker's statements had made.

KAISER COLLECTION TO PUBLIC LIBRARY

Prof. Mandel Makes Fine Gift of 200 Books on Emperor William II.

WORKS IN THREE TONGUES

Collection the Most Complete in Existence — Germany's Ruler from Every Angle.

John A. Mandel, professor of chemistry in the New York University and the Bellevue Hospital Medical College, has presented to the New York Public Library a collection of more than 200 books on Emperor William II. of Germany. It is believed to be the most complete collection of the kind in existence. The gift has been accepted with thanks by E. H. Anderson, Director of the library, who will cooperate with Prof. Mandel in adding from time to time new works about the Emperor to the collection.

It was while he was in Berlin in June, during the jubilee celebration in honor of the Kaiser, that Prof. Mandel got the idea of making this collection. He is American born of German descent, and has the greatest admiration for Germany's ruler. At first he intended the books for himself, but on thinking the matter over he came to the conclusion that it would be better to present them to the New York Public Library so that the people of this city might have ready to hand a fund of reliable information about the Emperor.

In his letter to Director Anderson, Prof. Mandel said:

"I take great pleasure in presenting to the New York Public Library a collection of contemporary works on his Majesty, Emperor William II. of Germany, collected at the time of the twenty-fifth anniversary of his ascent to the throne.

"I was actuated in making this collection by an ardent and enthusiastic admiration for his personality, and also by the lack of exact knowledge in America of the character and accomplishments of one of the geniuses of our times.

"It is my intention to add to this collection from time to time, and to keep it as complete as possible."

Tiffany & Co. have made for Prof. Mandel an artistic book plate, which will be inserted in each of the books in the collection. The book plate has an attractive border of Greek design. It contains this characteristic quotation selected by Prof. Mandel from a speech by William II. at Frankfort-on-Main in 1889:

"My entire work is directed to make my Fatherland great, powerful, and admired."

"It is an appropriate quotation," said Prof. Mandel, yesterday, "because it shows the true personality of the great Emperor, who is so often misjudged by those who have not well informed themselves about him from authoritative sources. The collection, begun while I was abroad, has been kept up to date, and so far as I know there is no other such collection in existence."

Books in Three Languages.

The books are in German, French, and English. The German authors predominate, and then come the English. The whole life of the Emperor to date is covered, his childhood, youth, school days, and manhood. Many of the books are illustrated.

One of the most interesting books is G. Hinzpeter's "Kaiser Wilhelm II.—eine skizze nach der Natur gezeichnet," published at Bielefeld in 1888. The author was a tutor of the Emperor at Cassel and gives an attractive sketch of him. He tells how the Kaiser in boyhood received religious instruction for a long time from a "liberal" pastor, one who cared little for dogma. Then a strictly orthodox divine was suddenly put in the "liberal's" place. It was to be expected that under these circumstances the royal pupil would become mentally confused. But such was not the case, however, and Hinzpeter writes:

"The peculiar capacity of his mind, which is not to be diverted from its own paths, to take from everything what suits it, enabled him to mold his religious ideas supplied by the material put before him to his personal use."

There are works on the Emperor's character, on his life, on his speeches and edicts, on his sayings, on his political and religious attitude, about his travels, and about the caricatures that have been made of him. There are also books by writers and others sometimes on his attitude toward the military, toward the marine, toward his people, toward woman suffrage, and toward alcohol.

Heinrich Perdon's "Kaiser Wilhelm II. und Rembrandt als Erzicher," published in Dresden in 1891, presents an excellent pen portrait of the Emperor as an educator. Another book "Kaiser Wilhelm II. und sein Ostlicher Nachlas" is by Poultney Bigelow, a schoolmate of the Emperor.

Lamprecht's Portrait.

Some of the books are already out of print, others are the latest works about him that have been issued. Among these are Stanley Shaw's "William of Germany," published in London this year, and "Der Kaiser," by Karl Lamprecht, the Leipsic historian, a work also published this year in Berlin. Lamprecht's book was written for the Kaiser's Jubilee, and gives a character sketch of him as he is today. It will be recalled that Lamprecht published a book on the same subject in 1900, which met with the Emperor's approval.

Lamprecht gives to William II. the quality of unswerving persistency of aims and ideals. The historian draws him as a man of fixed ideas in politics, art, religion, and ethics. One instance is his naval policy, at first laughed at, now carried to astonishing fruition. His mind, however, is open to new ideas. He loves speed. He has become more tolerant of other men, and more inclined to welcome their help. Lamprecht finds no danger in William's impulsiveness.

"The graver a subject is," he says, "the calmer grows the Emperor. In case of the greatest extremity, war, we need have no fear. The prospect on the contrary is excellent."

It has been Prof. Mandel's habit to go abroad every Summer, and a large part of his time there has been spent in Germany. He has thus had many opportunities to see what the great ruler has done for the development of Germany, not only in a commercial way, but also in education.

ROOSEVELT TO BOYS.

Holds Up Washington and Lincoln as Greatest Men in Our History.

Col. Theodore Roosevelt, while on the way to South America, wrote a message to the Boy Scouts of America, which is to appear in the next number of the Scouts' organ, Boys' Life. A part of the message reads:

On Board the Van Dyck,
Oct. 7, 1913.

Through Boys' Life I wish to send this message, not only to the Boy Scouts, but to all the boys of America. The prime lesson that the Boy Scout movement is teaching is the lesson that manliness in its most vigorous form can be, and ought to be, accompanied by unselfish consideration for the rights and interests of others.

Indeed, I can go a little further. I wish that I could make the especial appeal to the American boy to remember that unless he thinks of others he cannot fit himself to do the best work in any great emergency.

The names in our history to which we now look back with pride are the names of men who have rendered great service. This service may have been rendered at the same time that they themselves gained glory or reputation. But neither the glory nor the reputation would have been gained save as an incident to the service. In our history there is now practically no mention of any great financier, of any great business man, who merely made money for himself. If at some crisis in the nation's history that financier rendered a great national service, or if he identified himself in useful fashion with some great movement for good, whether in art or philanthropy or otherwise, then his name remains. But even under these conditions it remains as of secondary value. America's contribution to permanent world history has been made by the statesmen and soldiers whose devotion to country equalled their efficiency, by men of science, men of art, men of letters, by sane and honest reformers and social workers, who did great work and treated that work as in itself a great reward.

The two greatest men in our history are Washington and Lincoln. They possessed great ability, great intellect, and especially great sanity of mind; but it was the fact that they each possessed the highest character, a character both very strong and very unselfish, which gave them their preeminence over their fellows. There have been very able and very unscrupulous statesmen in our history, but not one of them has ever come within even measurable distance of the achievements of Washington and Lincoln, or of their reputation and inspiration. Not Lincoln; and this precisely because they were unscrupulous, because they lacked character.

The boy is not worth anything if he is not efficient. I have no use for mollycoddles, I have no use for timid boys, for the sissy type of boys. I want to see a boy able to hold his own and ashamed to flinch. But as one element of his ability to hold his own I wish to see him contemptuously indifferent to the mean or brutal boy who calls him "sissy," or a mollycoddle, because he is clean and decent and considerate to others. If a boy is not fearless and energetic, he is a poor creature; but he is an even poorer creature if he is a bully of smaller boys or girls, if he is guilty of cruel mischief, and if in his own home, and especially in his relation with his own mother and sisters, he is selfish and unfeeling.

I believe in play with all my heart; but I believe in work even more. While boy or man plays, I want to see him play hard; and when he works I don't want to see him play at all.

Faithfully yours,
THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

TO HASTEN RATE RULINGS.

Representative Levy Moves for 60-Day Limit for Decisions.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 22.—Representative Jefferson M. Levy to-day introduced a bill to amend the Interstate Commerce act so as to hasten decision in all railroad cases. The amendment provides that "all rate cases shall be decided by the commission within sixty days after being filed."

"I introduced this bill," said Mr. Levy, "so that the railroads may get a prompt and early decision from the commission in all rate cases to which they are justly entitled, just as in any suit pending before the courts of the country. In many of the judicial branches of the Government the limit for a decision is sixty days. The railroads should receive a decision from the commission within that period, because withholding it ties up an enormous amount of money and capital."

TEST OF LABOR LAW INTERESTS HOTELS

Garden City Hotel Sued Because It Worked a Mangler Seven Days a Week.

IS ITS LAUNDRY A FACTORY?

Justice Gittens Must Decide This Point—Decision Sought on an Agreed Set of Facts.

Special to The New York Times.

HEMPSTEAD, L. I., Nov. 20.—What will probably be the last in a series of test cases, which have made the name of Justice of the Peace Charles F. Gittens, known to the legal fraternity throughout the State, is awaiting his decision. It has been brought by James A. Orme, State Labor Inspector, against the J. J. Lannin Company, which conducts the Garden City Hotel, for the violation of Section 77 of the labor law, which forbids the employment of a woman in any factory for more than six days or fifty-four hours a week.

The first hearing was held on Nov. 17, when Orme called Lizzie Slamkoosky of Roslyn, L. I., a mangle operator in the hotel, as a material witness. For some reason little publicity has been given the case, despite the fact that its decision will probably establish a precedent, and will be watched with keen interest by both the legal profession and hotel owners and operators.

Lizzie Slamkoosky testified that she had worked at the mangle, in the Garden City Hotel, on Sunday as well as week days, and Inspector Orme himself swore that he had visited the hotel on Sunday, Aug. 31, and had seen her at work in the laundry.

As Lizzie speaks very poor English, with the interpreter's interventions and the lawyer's objections, the testimony became more muddled than was good for either side. So both plaintiff and defendant later entered into an agreement to set aside all the testimony and to request the court to decide the case on an agreed statement of facts.

Thus it was admitted that the J. J. Lannin Company was a domestic corporation, and ran a laundry for the purpose of hotel work as well as for its guests; that Lizzie Slamkoosky was over 18 years of age and had a monthly wage, which began on Aug. 31, 1913; that she was required to work 53½ hours per week—that is, 5½ hours on Sunday, Aug 31, and eight hours on each succeeding weekday, and that she was employed only on hotel laundry.

Thus, by the margin of half an hour the hotel has kept within the fifty-four-hour limit, but it must still explain why Lizzie worked on Sunday as well as on week days, thus violating the clause permitting only six days of work.

In deciding the case Justice Gittens will have to determine, first, whether or not the Garden City Hotel is a factory, as the clause forbidding seven-day labor refers only to factories, and not then has to consider what is a public laundry. According to Section 92, a factory is a shop or room of building where one or more persons are employed in doing public laundry work by way of trade or for purposes of gain. It must be subject to the visitation and inspection of the Commissioner of Labor, and no public laundry work may be done in a room used for sleeping or living purposes.

If Justice Gittens rules that the Garden City Hotel laundry room is a factory, the hotel people will be found guilty, for which case the fine is not less than $20 nor more than $50. No alternative is mentioned for a first offense. If the court decides that it is not a factory, but a private concern, the case will be dismissed. Whichever way the case goes, it will be referred to higher courts.

Frederick H. Cunningham of the State Department of Labor, with an office at 381 Fourth Avenue, is counsel for the State, and Frank H. K. Boland of Campbell & Boland, 51 Chambers Street, represents the J. J. Lannin Company. Although he himself is not a lawyer, Justice Gittens has had more of his decisions in well-known cases upheld by the Appellate Division than any other local Justice in this section.

Among the test cases which began in his court was the famous Paul Shayne case, in which the validity of the Agnew-Hart law as to oral betting was at issue. Before that the Justice presided at the hearing of the written bet case, which had as its setting the Salisbury golf links, and as its provocation the wager of a box of golf balls on a game. In addition to this he has sat in many sensational gambling raid cases, material for which was collected in the Rockaway Hunt Club section and Belmont Park, and he drew the first warrant when the Rev. Jere Cooke, pastor of St. George's Church, departed with Floretta Whaley.

This will probably be the last important case of Justice Gittens. He is nearly 70 years old, and will retire on Jan. 1 after three terms of office of four years each.

REPEATS ATTACK ON PRESS.

Foulke Answers Times's Comments on Newspaper Control.

Special to The New York Times.

RICHMOND, Ind., Nov. 22.—William Dudley Foulke, President of the National Municipal League, replying to an editorial in THE NEW YORK TIMES attacking his statement before the Toronto convention of the league, that the public did not know who really controlled newspapers, issued a statement to-day reiterating his position. Referring to THE TIMES's comment that attacks such as his could no longer be tolerated, Mr. Foulke says:

"I fear they will have to be, for they are likely to be renewed hereafter. THE TIMES has not yet persuaded our people to establish any holy office by which that portion of the press to which my words apply can exempt itself from criticism.

"THE TIMES says the papers are required to publish semi-annually the names of those who own 1 per cent. of their capital stock, and that they do this under oath. Is the editor really so simple-minded as not to know that even if such lists were generally known to the public, which they are not, and even if the amount of stock held by each stockholder were stated (which is not even required), it would still furnish no sufficient information as to who is actually in control?

"Has it never entered into the editor's mind to conceive that stock may be assigned, indorsed in blank, hypothecated, or otherwise controlled by those whose names do not appear in the stock book, and may even be unknown to the man who signs the returns, to say nothing of the public, and that in spite of the disclosures required by law? Moreover, does the mere name of the stockholder furnish any information as to the inner interests with which he is connected?"

To Provide for Senatorial Elections.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 22.—Temporary lawe for direct election of Senators were indorsed to-day by the Senate Elections Committee. Senator Poindexter's bill, providing that Senators shall be elected under present laws governing the selection of Representatives at Large or Governors until each State has made provision for election under the new constitutional amendment was recommended for passage.

Brief Filed in Fruit Icing Case.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 22.—Through its solicitor, Patrick J. Farrell, the Interstate Commerce Commission to-day filed its brief in the Supreme Court in the Santa Fé case, involving the reasonableness of icing charges on shipments of oranges from the Pacific Coast to all parts of the United States. The case is before the Supreme Court on appeal from the Commerce Court which upheld the commission's decision in the case, rendered Jan. 14, 1911, reducing the charges.

HAMMERSTEIN LIBEL ACTION

"Brutal" Newspaper Article, He Says, Forces Him to Court.

Oscar Hammerstein yesterday sent the following letter to THE NEW YORK TIMES:

American National Grand Opera Company,
New York, Nov. 22, 1913.

To the Editor and Publisher of THE NEW YORK TIMES, New York City.

Dear Sirs: The cancellation of my projected season in French and Italian in my opera house, now nearing completion, and the postponement of contracts with French and Italian singers till next season, have resulted in sudden but systematic concoctions of false and villainous stories cabled to the newspapers here from Paris.

Unquestionably the originators are my adversaries in my profession here, and they succeeded in making innocent tools of the newspaper correspondents in Paris.

To preserve my personal honor I have been compelled to take criminal action by placing the matter in the hands of the District Attorney. The editor-in-chief of The New York Herald, Mr. Pierson, has already been summoned to appear in the Tombs Police Court on Tuesday morning to explain or justify one of the most brutal libels ever published in a supposedly respectable newspaper. Respectfully yours,

OSCAR HAMMERSTEIN.

Mr. Pierson, city editor of The Herald, said last night that he had no comment to make on Mr. Hammerstein's action.

CITY BREVITIES.

Bainbridge Colby has been elected to succeed William J. Wollman as President of the Missouri Society.

The New York Chamber of Commerce has issued in book form a reproduction of the Chamber's earliest commercial arbitration records. The minutes of 1779 to 1792 show how extensively arbitration was employed as a means of settling disputes in business, the Chamber having maintained the system of commercial arbitration from its establishment in 1768.

There will be a citizens' testimonial dinner in honor of Mayor-elect John Purroy Mitchel at the Hotel Astor on Tuesday evening, Dec. 30. A meeting of the committee to make arrangements will take place at the Hotel Astor to-morrow at 5 P. M.

The annual meeting of the donors and members of the Montefiore Home for Chronic Invalids will be held at the home, Gun Hill Road, near Jerome Avenue, next Sunday, when the annual report will be read and ten directors elected.

The After Care Circle of the Jewish Maternity Hospital will hold its second annual meeting in the vestry rooms of Temple Emanu-El to-morrow afternoon at 2:30 o'clock. Dr. Herman Schwarz, a child specialist, will speak.

The Judaeans will hold a meeting this evening at the Hotel Astor, in honor of Rabbi Harry S. Lewis of Manchester, England, co-author of "The Jew in London," and first Lewisohn Lecturer at the United States, who is visiting this country. Two members who have just been elected to public office, Marcus M. Marks, President-elect of the Borough of Manhattan, and Benjamin N. Cardozo, Justice-elect of the Supreme Court, will be honored guests also.

PUBLIC COMPLAINS OF SUBWAY DAMAGE

Householders Annoyed by Interruption of Their Water Supply by Tunnel Building.

BESIEGE UTILITIES BOARD

Contractors Charged with Not Giving Due Notice When They Intend to Shut Off Mains.

Many complaints have been received by the Public Service Commission of damage and annoyance caused to property owners along Lexington Avenue by the construction of the new subways. Houses have been shaken by blasts, damage has been done to the pipes connecting with the sewers and gas mains, and in some cases the proprietors of boarding houses have lost their patrons because of the conditions.

Special complaint was made yesterday of the cutting off of the water in East Seventy-fourth Street twice within twenty-four hours. The first time was on Friday morning, when, soon after breakfast, the householders were notified that they must be prepared to go without water in their cisterns for the entire day. Only half an hour's notice was given to them, and while the women of the households scurried to find tubs, basins and so on to hold a temporary supply, the men ran to the telephones and began to call up the Public Service Commission.

There they were informed that the matter did not concern the Commission, as the control of the water supply belonged to the Department of Water Supply. Communication with that bureau showed that the main had to be turned off for a time, because McGovern & Co., the contractor for the section of the Subway in this part of Lexington Avenue, to make a connection between the city's mains and its own pipes.

As a matter of fact the water was turned on again after it had been off for only an hour or so, and when the householders pointed to their tubs brimming with water and thought of the panic in which they had been, they were informed that they had been told they would be deprived of the use of their regular pipes for an entire day merely as a matter of precaution.

However a few hours later they wished that they still had those tubs full. Around 3 o'clock in the morning there was a break in the six-inch water main and when the contractor's men looked round for lead to make temporary repairs none was to be found at that hour of the day. The break was not a very serious one in itself, and could have been repaired in an hour or so, but in the absence of the materials to repair it there was nothing for it but to cut off the water from the district again.

So when the householders awoke yesterday morning there was not a drop of water to be had for breakfast or the ordinary domestic purposes. Once more there was hurrying to the telephone, and the householders had to go out and buy bottles of water with which to make tea and coffee. The contractor's men, it was complained to the commission, had not set to work on repairs until 7 o'clock, and the hours before the city awoke in which the damage might have been put right were wasted utterly. It was not until 10:30 o'clock that the main was in working order and once more the ordinary routine of that part of the city could be resumed.

While there can be no doubt that this particular annoyance was directly due to the construction work on the new subways, other damages have been suffered which in all probability are due to the same cause but which it is very difficult to trace to any negligence on the part of the contractors. Thus one family in East Seventy-fourth Street, on its return this Autumn from the country, found that one of the main pipes leading to its house had been wrecked and that expensive repairs were necessary. There can be little doubt that some jar caused by blasting put the pipe out of business, it was said, as nothing else could have affected a pipe buried deep in the ground, but there does not seem to be any way of proving it legally.

Under the law the contractors are responsible for all damage done in the subway construction. The Public Service Commission before the actual digging takes place has been very careful to inspect the buildings along the subway routes, and have them photographed within and without so as to ascertain their precise condition before the work begins.

It also insists that when a building has been damaged the contractor must put it back into the same condition as it was before, and thus, it is asserted, these thorough repairs leave a building often in better shape than it was before the subway work began.

GETS A WILSON PAINTING.

John D. Phelan Buys "Old Lyme" for His San Francisco Club.

Two more paintings by Mrs. Woodrow Wilson were placed on exhibition yesterday in the Arlington Art Gallery, at 274 Madison Avenue. Later in the day one of them, "Old Lyme," was purchased by J. D. Phelan, former Mayor of San Francisco. The price paid was $150. Mr. Phelan is President of the Bohemian Club of San Francisco, and the painting will grace the walls of the club. He also purchased four other paintings.

The money received from the sale of her paintings Mrs. Wilson devotes to the advancement of the Berry School, an industrial institution for boys and girls near Rome, Ga.

Hear Telephone Complaints Friday.

Special to The New York Times.

ALBANY, Nov. 22.—Chairman Decker of the up-State Public Service Commission will sit in New York City next Friday to hear arguments on the complaints of Douglas Robinson, the Charles S. Brown Company, Harrison B. Well, and the Globe Realty Company against the New York Telephone Company in the matter of rates for apartment house and switchboard service, and on the application of the Postal Telegraph-Cable Company for an order reducing the charge of the New York Telephone Company for switchboard telephone extension in New York City.

MERCURY VICTIMS BETTER.

Two Are Likely to Recover After Operations at Hospital.

Mrs. Helen Janin, who took twenty-one grains of bichloride of mercury in her home in West New Brighton, S. I., fifteen days ago, has partially recovered, it was said last night, at the Smith Infirmary. Dr. Thomas, who performed an operation on her kidneys, said her temperature, respiration, and heart action were normal. She has been taking substantial nourishment for several days. She will remain at the infirmary another week.

The infirmary surgeons said they were satisfied the operation had been a success and that it would be the method used to save the lives of other persons suffering from the effects of bichloride of mercury.

A distinctly encouraging report came last night from only one of the three Bronx cases of bichloride of mercury poisoning where the knife was used during the week in Fordham and Lebanon Hospitals.

At Fordham it was reported that Mrs. Agnes Pleasants of 590 East 184th Street was somewhat improved, and that if nothing unfavorable developed she would recover. Mrs. Pleasants was operated upon last Tuesday night. Mrs. Mary Browning of 1,972 Barnes Avenue, who underwent the kidney operation on Friday night, was said to be in a fair condition, better and no worse, with the outcome in doubt.

At Lebanon Hospital Mrs. Leah Fortel of 1,000 Southern Boulevard was said to be very much worse, and although the doctors would not say she could not live, they admitted that her chances were slender. Mrs. Fortel took the poison by mistake on Friday night, and was operated on within a few hours. The gravity of her case was intensified by the fact that she took 50 grains of the bichloride in solution.

TAKEN FOR HEADACHE POWDER

Mrs. Robson's Mistake in Swallowing Mercury Likely to be Fatal.

Special to The New York Times.

NYACK, N. Y., Nov. 22.—Mrs. Imogene Robson, wife of the business manager of the Helen Gardner Moving-Picture Company, which has its headquarters at Tappan, took four tablets of bichloride of mercury by mistake at her home last night, and came to the Nyack Hospital to-day with little chance of recovery.

Mrs. Robson, a moving-picture actress, had a severe headache and went to the bathroom to get headache tablets. The mercury tablets and the headache tablets were in boxes looking very much alike, and Mrs. Robson took the bichloride. She soon discovered her mistake and summoned a physician.

SPONGERS WIN STRIKE.

Question of Closed Shop to be Submitted to Arbitration.

The strike of the 400 members of the Cloth Spongers and Examiners' Union, which had been on for ten days, was settled yesterday at a conference at the Hotel St. Denis between representatives of the union and leading employers. The strike had threatened to tie up most of the city's garment industry, since the examiners and spongers had to inspect and shrink garment cloth before it could be made up.

Both parties agreed to submit the question of open or closed shop in the sponging branch of the industry to arbitration. All other demands of the union were granted. These included a Saturday half holiday the year around, $2 a week increase for all examiners and spongers, and full pay for holidays. The successful outcome of the conference was due to Benjamin S. Moss, a retired employer in the industry, who took part in the conferences as a mediator.

GAYNOR FOREMAN WON'T GO.

Relying on Contract with Late Mayor, He Stays at St. James.

John Wilson, foreman in charge of the late Mayor Gaynor's place at St. James, L. I., is defying Norman Gaynor to put him out of his house on the farm or to discharge him. He is relying on a contract which he says was drawn up by Mayor Gaynor himself.

This gives Wilson the use for one year from March 1 last of a farmhouse and buildings on the Gaynor estate, and requires him to use every effort to make the farm produce as much as possible. It also grants Wilson for his own use such butter, eggs, and other produce as he and his family need, and a salary of $50 a month. Wilson says his salary has been paid up to Nov. 1, but he wants it up to March 1 next, and he will not move out of the house he uses until his year is up.

Norman Gaynor, Wilson alleges, told him last month that after Nov. 1 his services would not be required, and when he refused to leave tried to have him ejected. He has retained Livingston Smith of St. James, an ex-District Attorney of Suffolk County, and has begun suit for his salary.

BARNES MUST GIVE NAMES.

In Suit for Commissions, He Says Sale Was Made Direct.

Judge Hand filed an opinion yesterday in the Federal District Court directing Thurlow Weed Barnes to disclose the names of persons to whom he has contended he could have sold certain Southern oil fields, now in the possession of the Standard Oil Company, for more than $10,000,000.

Barnes is suing Joseph C. Trees, Michael L. Benedum, Harry S. Grayson, and the J. C. Trees Oil Company for commissions on the sale of oil lands amounting to $3,000,000. He asserts that he was authorized to sell the oil lands and was negotiating with a German bank for their purchase at $19,500,000, when he was informed that the defendants had disposed of the lands without his knowledge to the Standard Oil Company for $10,000,000.

Collector Malone Gives Bond.

Dudley Field Malone, the new Collector of the Port, executed a bond for $320,000, the amount of the surety required by the United States Government, yesterday. The purpose of the bond is to secure the Government against any dereliction of the Collector in his official duties.

TAXICAB OWNERS OBEY NEW LAW

License Bureau Busy All Day Registering Meters to Comply with Ordinance.

HOTEL STANDS FREE TO ALL

Yellow Taxicab Company Withdraws Cabs from Private Stations and Relies on Calls by Telephone.

The Inspectors in the Taxicab Department of the City License Bureau were kept busy all-day yesterday by those who wished to register their cabs under the new hack ordinance, which was upheld by the decision of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, returned on Friday. James G. Wallace, Jr., head of the bureau, said last night that no cabs would be allowed in the streets which had not been passed by his Inspectors. No complaints against unlicensed cabs were received by Deputy Chief John Drennan of the Mayor's Bureau of Licenses last night, and he said that the cabs which were operating from what had been private stands—that is, from the hotels and clubs—had complied with the new law.

An evidence of the anxiety of the taxicab companies to meet the law, now that it had been upheld, was afforded by the Seaman Transportation Company, which sent a check for $1,000 to the Taxicab Inspection Bureau yesterday. The Seaman concern is the second largest taxicab company in the city. The check was to pay for 200 new licenses for its taxicabs. It held already 165 licenses, which were taken out before the injunction was issued staying the enforcement of the new law.

Among the companies which sent cabs to be licensed yesterday were the New Taxi and Auto Company and the Renault Taxicab Company. Some fifty cabs were licensed for these two concerns. Little difficulty was encountered in inspecting these cars, as the American Taximeter Company, which makes most of the meters for the public cabs, had prepared meters in advance of the Appellate Division's decision to comply with the provisions of the new law. The taxicab meters were tested by lifting the wheels to which they were attached from the floor of the Inspection Bureau's garage at 248 West Forty-ninth Street on a "jack." The wheels were then revolved for the equivalent of several miles by a dynamo and the meters on the cabs were compared with standard meters. Arrangements had been perfected in the garage under which six cabs could be tested in this way at one time. It was said that the fact that the manufacturers of meters had been able to provide an adequate supply vindicated the attitude of Justice Donnelly, who refused to grant these manufacturers an injunction to restrain the city from enforcing the new taxicab ordinance.

The meters tested yesterday were found to register accurately the rates provided under the new law. These rates are 30 cents for the first half mile for one or two persons, and 40 cents for the first half mile for three or more persons. After that the rate for two persons is 10 cents for a quarter of a mile or a fraction of that distance, and 10 cents for each sixth of a mile for three or more passengers.

Deputy Chief Drennan sent out several truck loads of signs to be put before the hotels which had kept public hacks from their stands through the junctions. Among the places at which signs were erected were: The Hotel Waldorf-Astoria, the Café de Paris, the Knickerbocker, and the St. Regis. Mr. Drennan said that all signs would be in place on Monday.

The Yellow Taxicab Company, which made the principal fight on the ordinance, and which operated the largest number of taxicabs under an arrangement with hotels, made no effort yesterday to have its cabs licensed under the ordinance. It took steps, however, to send cabs on call to the hotels. From stands in the vicinity of Times Square and Greeley Square it attempted to operate a quick service to hotels on call. It also sent out cabs from its garage, but did not try to do a public hacking business. One of its officers said yesterday:

"From reports that come to us from the hotels, we do not believe that the taxicab users will like the kind of service they will get from public stands. If we could afford to do it, we would withdraw our cabs from the streets for a year and let the public see the difference. At the end of that time we could get anything we wanted."

MRS. HAVERTY'S NEW TROUBLE

Woman Taxi Owner Worse Off Than When Fighting Strike.

Mrs. Catherine Haverty, whose taxicabs are run by strikebreakers owing to the strike of the chauffeurs in Haverty's Taxicabs, Limited, of which she is the head, found herself confronted with a difficult situation yesterday owing to the enforcement of the taxicab ordinance, held valid by the Appellate Division. Before yesterday Haverty's had nearly broken the strike and had twenty-five cabs in commission. Yesterday it was able to operate only two machines. John W. Brown, counsel for Mrs. Haverty, said last evening:

"When we learned that the injunction had been dissolved, we hustled last night and had the photographs of the new men taken so that they could get their licenses as public hackmen under the new law. Every difficulty was thrown in their way at the Bureau of Licenses.

"It was declared in some cases that the photographs were not likenesses of the men presenting them. Some of our men were sent around from pillar to post. They say strikers were also around trying to mislead them. At all events, with one thing and another, we were only able to get out two taxicabs. In the cases of the companies which had no strike their chauffeurs were better known, and there was no trouble."

STATE AID FOR WIDOWS.

New York Commission to Hear Arguments To-morrow and Tuesday.

Representatives of most of the leading charitable societies of this city will be heard to-morrow and Tuesday at morning and afternoon sessions of the State Commission on Relief for Widowed Mothers in the rooms of the Board of Estimate at the City Hall. Aaron J. Levy, Chairman of the commission, will preside, and most of the fourteen other members of the commission will be present.

The commission was organized on Sept. 23, and has collected the laws on the subject in twenty-two States where State aid is given to widowed mothers. After the hearings on Monday and Tuesday, representatives of the commission will travel to several of the States where such laws are in effect to study their operation. The commission will make its report to the State Legislature next March.

Most of the charitable societies in this city have already made it known that they favor State aid for widowed mothers, but the sentiment is not unanimous. Richard M. Neustadt, Secretary of the commission, said last night that some of the charitable societies would oppose the plan to give State aid to widowed mothers on the ground that such cases were already sufficiently provided for by charities in existence, and that such a law would be dangerous as opening the way to paternalistic legislation of a radical character.

Mr. Neustadt said that the investigation made by the commission showed that the largest relief was given to widowed mothers in Chicago. There $15 a month is allowed the widowed mother for one child and $10 a month for each of the others; providing that the total shall not exceed $50 a month. This applies not only to widows, but to all mothers who have no means of support for their children.

Some of those who will speak at the hearings are Dr. Edward T. Devine of the New York School of Philanthropy, the Rev. John Haynes Holmes of the Church of the Messiah, Frank Tucker of the Provident Loan Society, Alfred T. White, President of the Brooklyn Board of Charities, Robert W. de Forest, Otto T. Bannard, Lillian D. Wald, Mrs. V. G. Simkhovitch of Greenwich House, E. S. Dougherty, President of the St. Vincent de Paul Society, and Morris D. Waldman of the United Hebrew Charities.

Mother Thought Boys Were Joking When They Said Frank Had "Gone"

Isadore Brictman, with two of his playmates, ran into the Brictman home at 237 South Second Street, Williamsburg, just at dark last evening, and told his mother that Frank, Isadore's five-year-old brother, had "gone."

"Gone where?" the mother asked, amused, and when they did not seem to know, she laughed and went on with her work. It was not until supper time, two hours later, when Frank had not appeared, that she became worried, and, remembering what the other children had said, found them and did some cross-examining. Then the story came out. They had all been playing on a sandbank on the edge of the East River at the foot of their street, two blocks away, when Frank had lost his balance and pitched into the water. That had frightened them and they had run away. Last night the police were grappling for the body.

NEED TIMES SQUARE STATIONS TOGETHER

Commission's Plan for Local Station There on B. R. T. Line Meets with Much Opposition.

BUSINESS MEN PROTEST

Plan for Connecting Concourse Below Ground to be Considered by the Public Service Board.

The question of the arrangement of the new subway stations at Times Square, it is expected, will be considered by the Public Service Commission in committee of the whole to-morrow morning.

The Seventh Avenue station of the Interborough is to be placed with its northern end at Forty-second Street and running down Seventh Avenue to Fortieth Street with entrances at both streets and an additional exit at Forty-first Street. It will be an express station. According to the tentative list of stations prepared by the commission the B. R. T. Broadway-Seventh Avenue line would have had only a local station at Times Square, also below Forty-second Street, with an express station running from Forty-ninth Street to Forty-seventh Street.

A very strong feeling against this arrangement has been entertained by the people doing business in the neighborhood of Times Square, which has been voiced by the Broadway Association and the Forty-second Street Subway Association, among others. They suggested that it was of prime importance for the convenience of the public to place the two express stations close together, and to connect them by a concourse below grade, as already exists at Greeley Square at the present terminus of the McAdoo Tubes. By this means, it was been urged, the great amount of traffic converging there would be distributed with the least possible inconvenience, and the greatest facilities would be afforded to those wishing to transfer from the B. R. T. to the Interborough and vice versa.

The commission will have before it the suggestions of the business men of the Times Square neighborhood and a plan drawn up by Henry G. Opdycke, consulting engineer of the Broadway Association, suggesting a means of meeting the popular desire.

Alfred Craven, Chief Engineer of the Public Service Commission, has filed with the commission, the Interborough, and the Brooklyn Rapid Transit, in accordance with the dual subway system contracts, his determination of the costs of construction and equipment of the new lines incurred before the contracts were signed on March 19 last. From these it appears that on the Interborough lines $8,854,854.38 had been spent before March 19 on construction, of which $8,570,064.81 is credited to the city and $284,289.45 to the company. The cost of equipment of the same lines up to that date is determined as being $55,440, which the Interborough will have to pay.

In the same way for the new B. R. T. lines the cost of construction before the signing of the contracts is determined by Mr. Craven to have been $34,185,324.24, of which the city is credited with $33,477,321.94 and $708,002.30 is set down to the company. The total cost of the equipment up to March 19 is set down at $784,488.22, which the company will have to bear.

Mr. Craven notes in his report that he has eliminated from the charges put in by the Interborough for legal expenses and administrative services the expenses of the publicity campaign it carried on during the agitation over the subway question.

The commission has required the B. R. T. in letting the construction contract for Section 2 of the elevated railroad connection between the Lutheran Cemetery line and the Myrtle Avenue line to follow the same procedure for a public competition as it follows itself. The B. R. T. itself owns the existing railroads and will pay the cost of the work, but the commission will not permit it to select its own contractor.

The plans and form of contract already have been submitted to and approved by the commission, and now it has directed the company to advertise for bids for at least two weeks, to open the bids in public, and to submit them to the commission for its consideration before the contract is awarded.

Topakyan Made Fair Commissioner.

Special to The New York Times.

SAN FRANCISCO, Nov. 22.—H. H. Topakyan, Consul General for Persia in New York, who is here with the Persian Minister, has just received a cable from the Primo Minister of Persia appointing him Commissioner General for Persia at the Panama-Pacific Exposition. Mr. Topakyan has made many friends here during his visit.

WHAT CITY PLANNING IS.

Instructive Exhibit Opens To-morrow at Public Library.

The City Planning Exhibition, which opens to-morrow in the Public Library, Fifth Avenue and Forty-second Street, and will continue through Dec. 7, is the most comprehensive collection of drawings, photographs, maps, charts, tabulation and bibliography on this particular subject ever gathered together for display in this country. Presented by the City of New York, with the co-operation of the Merchants' Association, it is expected to prove a most potent and valuable influence in the education of the public on this movement in the modern life of cities.

At the formal opening to-morrow Cyrus C. Miller, President of the Borough of the Bronx, will officiate and make an address, but there will be an informal opening this afternoon for Mayor Kline and other city officials and invited guests. An elaborate programme for the two weeks has been prepared, with a special feature for each day and a lecture on very nearly every day by some person of prominence who has made a study of the many varied features of city planning.

The response with which the invitations sent by the City Planning Exhibition Commission, asking the co-operation of the officials of many foreign cities and officials of all American cities of more than 10,000 inhabitants, were met is evidence of the widespread and growing interest in the subject.

City planning is the name given to the science and art of providing for the most practicable and agreeable development of a city or town, the co-ordinating and the harmonizing of the work of all the agencies, public and private, which have to do with the material or physical development of a community.

It is the purpose of the exhibition which opens to-morrow in the Public Library to show that city planning is a good business proposition; it is merely the exercise of that prudence and foresight in the development of the city that the good business man shows in his private affairs; that it is not a squandering of the city's money on vague splendid dreams, but a recognition of the fact that good design costs little, if any, more than bad design.

ANGRY HUSBAND HIS DREAD.

Newark Man Armed in Fear of Man with Whose Wife He Fled.

Arrested on suspicion that he was a burglar and then held for carrying a concealed weapon, William Thomas of 199 Fairmont Avenue, Newark, told yesterday a story of running away several years ago with Mrs. Clara West of Lynchburg, Va. He was forced to tell this story in order to explain why he carried a revolver.

Thomas was arrested near his own home. At Police Headquarters he indignantly denied that he was a burglar, and said that recently Mrs. West's husband had found out where his wife was living and had threatened to kill him. Mrs. West came to Police Headquarters later and corroborated the story. Thomas was a boarder in her home in Lynchburg, she said, and her husband treated her and her young daughter Catherine badly. So she left him.

Early last week her husband found out she was living in Fairmont Avenue. He had tried to persuade her to return to him, and upon her refusal, she said, he had threatened to shoot Thomas on sight. When Mrs. West was informed that Thomas had been held in $1,000 bail for carrying a revolver, she wept.

WOULD HOLD PHILIPPINES.

Ex-Gov. Forbes Says Natives Aren't Ready for Self-Government.

W. Cameron Forbes, ex-Governor General of the Philippines, arrived last night on the French liner France, after nine years' service in the islands. On his way home Mr. Forbes spent three weeks in India, visiting Calcutta, Delhi, Agra, and Bombay to study the methods used by the British Government in dealing with the natives. In regard to the proposal to give the Filipinos their independence Mr. Forbes said:

"The plans to give the natives their liberty is premature. It will be a long time before they are equal to such a step."

He said that he was going to Boston to enter business in that city.

Another passenger on the France was Robert Goldschmidt, who said that he had come to America to conduct experiments at Arlington, Va., in wireless telegraphy. He hoped, he said, to get into communication from the United States Government wireless station with his own station at Brussels, Belgium.

A Sale Which Will Crown Our Greatest Effort!

450 Women's $35 to $55 Suits At $24.50 and $29.50

A new and more emphatic adjective than one will find in the dictionary, is necessary to give proper emphasis to this Sale. We have never had anything like it before, and, to our knowledge it has never been equalled in New York.

The backwardness of the season explains why such an extraordinary Sale is possible. When you stop to think that the tailors will not have use for velveteens, other fabrics and furs in the Spring, then you can realize it yourself.

Before we contracted with several leading tailors for certain surplus materials, we stipulated that the Suits would have to be made in the

Women's Coats of Hudson Seal—Which Is the Nearest Approach to Sealskin—$95 to $125

Ever since Alaska Sealskin has been prohibited, the greatest fur-dyeing experts in the world have been endeavoring to make a perfect imitation of that rich fur. After many experiments they discovered that fine sheared muskrat yielded most successfully to the dyeing, and since then they have been perfecting the dyes, until now they have attained one that gives the excellent result you will find in this fur, which is known as Hudson Seal.

The Coats at $95 are in three-quarter and full-length models—lined with beautiful brocaded silks. So are those at $125, but at this price they have collars of ermine or German fitch.

The Quintessence of Loveliness!

These Lace Blouses, Draped with Chiffon, at $18.75

Snowy clouds of chiffon are draped to give the graceful surplice effect (both back and front) to the new model

"Nanette"

A new lace that imitates a fine old French design, is introduced in this model. And it is made more effective by a lining of flesh-color net. Of course, is has the Marie de Medici collar and frills of tulle.

"Rosamond"

is an attractive blouse because it is so different; it is only draped with chiffon in the back. This veiling is usually in rose, or another beautiful color, to match its crushed girdle of moire ribbon, which extends across the back, and which is inset between the lace and tulle lining in the front. The chiffon is repeated in wee bands around the wrists.

'CROSS' OF LARKIN IS FIRING ENGLAND

Rough Dock Laborer's Blazing Speeches Stir Those Who Hear or Read.

WORKERS NEAR REVOLT

Party Leaders Wonder How the Agitator's Fierce Appeals Will Affect Home Rule's Future.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, Nov. 22.—"Jim" Larkin is the man of the week. Thousands have listened to his fiery, rude eloquence at the Albert Hall and other huge buildings too small to accommodate all who would listen, and thousands more have read in the newspapers the reports of his speeches.

A labor paper which is printing them in full has had its circulation going up with such leaps that its affairs were transformed in one week from the verge of bankruptcy to comparative affluence.

Newspapers which generally make an appeal to the conservative class have been found speaking of Larkin in terms of high praise.

"He is the will and the fate to the multitude," wrote The Times, adding that this rough dock laborer had fascinated idealists and poets and followers of high ideals and the heroic.

"Whether we like it or not," says a writer in another London paper, "James Larkin is a man with whom we have to reckon. He drops his H's and uses violent language. He talks a strange dialect, half Lancashire, half Irish, and it is all his own. He is a crude, unlettered dock laborer, in fact, but you cannot listen to him without being conscious of an unusual force. You forget the roughness of his speeches in the fierce energy that blazes through them. You seem to hear the murmurs of the poor, struggling for utterance; and, if that utterance is defiant and challenging, it is not that of a mere tub-thumper. It has sudden flashes of insight, swift, unexpected transitions, a certain largeness of motive, and, at time, a generosity of statement that suggests something more than a firebrand.

"He is not at the mercy of his audience like the demagogue, who follows the line of readiest cheer. He is its master and snubs its shallow humors.'"

Larkin is a man upon whom, it is no exaggeration to say, the whole course of British politics seems to pivot. Time alone will show what influence his personality will exercise upon the nation's destinies now shaping, but, judged by present appearances, it is likely to prove deep and real.

He has injected, as has already been described in dispatches to THE NEW YORK TIMES, a new factor into the labor situation. The revolt of the rank and file against what is called the red-tape officialism of the Labor Party's Parliamentary leaders, has grown apace this week. When it was announced at the Albert Hall meeting that the English Trade Union executives had deferred a decision upon the question of a general sympathetic strike in aid of the Dublin Transport Workers, the building rang with howls of execration.

Yesterday Larkin issued a manifesto addressed to British workers denouncing the leaders, "some of whom," he says, "have forgotten that they have worked at the bench or in the factory on the dock or in the stokehole.

"They have forgotten the footplate and the engine, forgotten the laborious work of the goods yard. They seem to think that round-table conferences with nice language and beautiful phrases that fall trippingly from the tongue, and conciliation boards and agreements are the be all and end all of life."

Larkin appeals to British workers to wake up their leaders and make them remember that they are "not there as apologists for the shortcomings of the capitalist system nor as a brake upon the wheel of progress."

The British Trade Union leaders respond that it is not their mission to assist Larkin's Syndicalist method and that the tactics of Dublin must not be repeated in England.

It is evident, however, that those leaders do not represent the whole body of workers. Sectional strikes are threatening in several industries where the workers are in sympathy with Larkin and his methods and war clouds are gathering, particularly in the North of England.

The Syndicalists favor a widespread strike before Christmas. They are encouraged by the discontent of the postal employes and the unrest generally prevalent among railwaymen.

But it is not only the labor situation that is affected by Larkin's trip to "raise the fiery cross" in England. The political outlook is liable to be completely changed. The Unionists have shown a keen sense of the potentialities of trouble for the Liberal Government which are embodied in the Larkin movement, and the Liberals, on their side, have not had their fears lessened by the week's happenings.

One non-partisan paper has remarked:

"It may well be that Larkin has fought a bigger battle than he realized and that the whole course of British politics at an hour of supreme crisis, is deflected by an incident entirely outside of them."

Home Rule, according to those who believe in Larkin's influence, has in

WIRELESS AND CABLE DISPATCHES TO THE TIMES

FINE DAYS IN PARIS; SOCIETY IS BUSY

Avenues and Fashionable Drives in the Bois Now Crowded in the Afternoons.

AMERICANS ARE PROMINENT

Herrick Gives Farewell Dinner to Lieut. Col. Mott—Much Entertaining in Hotels.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, Nov. 22.—The Autumn social season is now getting well into its stride, the fine weather of the last few days having been a great help. The avenues and fashionable drives in the Bois are full of smart automobiles and traps on afternoons, while in the evening the streets are crowded with automobiles hurrying on their social round.

Americans are specially active in adding to the éclat of the new season. Ambassador Herrick gave a farewell dinner this week for Lieut. Col. T. Bentley Mott, the retiring Military Attaché of the American Embassy, at which Major Spencer Cosby, the new Attaché, and Mrs. Cosby were guests. The Cosbys are staying temporarily in the Rue de Balzac, but expect to take an apartment soon and do considerable entertaining.

Mrs. Wayne Cuyler gave a tea in her apartment in the Rue Piquot on Tuesday. Among her guests were Gen. and Mrs. Winslow, Mrs. James T. Burden, Rear Admiral and Mrs. Boggs, Mrs. Frederick L. Chapin, Mrs. Richard McCreary, and Mrs. Ruthven Pratt.

Mrs. Stanford White gave a tea on Monday. Among those present were Mrs. Griswold Gray, Mrs. Ralph Hickock, Mme. de Gast, Augustus Eddy, and Mrs. Richard Corbin.

Mrs. Frederick L. Chapin left Paris Wednesday for Nice to join her husband, who is on the Wyoming. He was formerly Naval Attaché at Paris.

Consul General and Mrs. Mason held a reception on Wednesday for Dean B. Mason, Consul at Algiers, and his wife.

Mrs. Edward Lauterbach gave a tea, among her guests being the Marquis and Marquise de Wentworth, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Valois, Mrs. Clarence Postley, Mrs. W. S. Dalliba, and Princess Nicolas Engalitcheff.

At the annual meeting of the Paris Society of American painters, W. T. Dannat was elected President, Walter MacEwen First Vice President, Richard Miller Second Vice President, Eugene La Chaise Secretary, and Julius Stewart Treasurer. Charles Hawthorne was elected a member of the society.

Mrs. Tower Reilly gave a tea at the Hôtel du Rhin, and among those present were Gen. and Mrs. Winslow, Mr. and Mrs. W. Spencer of the American Embassy at Berlin, Adolphus L. Helwin, and the Countess Wachtmeister.

Mrs. Griswold Gray gave a dinner at her home in the Avenue Victor Hugo for Mrs. Hamilton McK. Twombly previous to the sailing of Mrs. Twombly and her daughter, Ruth, for America on the Kronprinzessin Cecilie.

The Baronne de St. Pascal gave a dinner for Mrs. Felix Potter, who is in Paris for a few days on her way to Italy. Among those present were Mr. and Mrs. Franklin Carter, Mr. and Mrs. Benjamin J. Ware, Fred Seymour, and Miss Maude Johnson.

One of the most brilliant receptions of the week was one given by James Hazen Hyde for Guglielmo Ferrero, the Italian historian. Among the guests were Ambassador Herrick, M. Deschanel, the President of the Chamber of Deputies; Gabriel Hanotaux, Gen. de Lecroix, Comte de Naleche, and Prof. Van Tyne of Harvard University.

Mrs. John W. Stewart and her daughter Margaret gave a dinner dance on Tuesday. Among the guests were the Duchesse de la Rochefoucauld, Marques and Marquesa de Amodio, Commander and Mrs. H. H. Hough, Miss Kate Fuller, Mrs. Duryea, Loftus Hennegan, and John S. James.

B. J. Shoninger, President of the American Chamber of Commerce, gave a breakfast at the Ritz on Wednesday for Chevalier Legrand, President of the International Chambers of Commerce of the World, who is in Paris for a few days. Among the guests was Henry Morgenthau, who is in Paris on the way to his new post in Turkey.

A farewell tea was given at the Lyceum Club for Miss J. Carryl Smith, Deaconess for the last nine years at Holy Trinity lodge, who will sail for America Wednesday, on account of the closing of the lodge. Mrs. Frank H. Mason, wife of the Consul General, made a speech. The guests included Mr. and Mrs. Dent Mowrey, Miss Alys Hallard, Mrs. Hugh Reid Griffin, Mrs. Rossiter Howard, and Miss Mary Pratt.

Mr. and Mrs. Frank Milton Armington gave a studio reception in the Boulevard du Montparnasse, when they exhibited Mr. Armington's latest work, a portrait of Miss Helen Judson of New York, who is visiting her aunt, Mrs. David H. Judson.

Mrs. George Audenreid resumed her at homes in the Rue Galliée Tuesday. Among those present were Miss Helen Stanley, Mr. and Mrs. Milan Soule, Mrs. and Miss Vanderpoel, Miss Harriet Sproule, and the Comtesse de Coëtlogon.

Rear Admiral Swinburne, who has returned from America to join his wife in Paris, has taken an apartment in the Hôtel Vernet.

Mrs. Oswald Ormsby has arrived from England with her little son and her mother, and is at the Hotel Imperial.

E. Lake and Mr. and Mrs. R. Ford arrived at the Carlton from New York this week, and Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Wetterhaugh arrived at the Chatham from New York.

Mrs. J. A. and Miss McKenna left the Astoria for New York.

Mrs. W. Hall and Mrs. C. C. Adams arrived at the Crillon. Mr. and Mrs. F. E. Lonas arrived at the Hotel Edward VII. from London.

Mr. and Mrs. W. Davies arrived at the Grand Hotel from New York.

G. Kieling has returned to the Iéna from Prague.

Mr. and Mrs. W. B. Ayre and Mr. and Mrs. G. Good are at Lotti's from London.

W. A. Stanton has left the Meurice for New York.

Mr. and Mrs. Frank Lowry have left the Plaza for New York.

Mr. and Mrs. John McGee, and Dr. and Mrs. Thomas Kissam have left the Ritz on the way to New York.

Mrs. Rutherfurd Stuyvesant is returning to America to visit friends.

Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Whistler of Philadelphia have left the Crillon for the Riviera, while Mr. and Mrs. Max Lewis of Philadelphia have gone to Cairo.

G. M. Cassatt has arrived at the Edward VII from Zurich and Mr. and Mrs. F. M. Berry have left the same hotel for New York.

Commodore Herbert P. Tillotson and daughters have arrived at the Meurice from automobiling in southern Europe.

Mr. and Mrs. J. R. Tough are at the Bedford from Berlin.

C. Laurent is at the Chatham.

American Ambassador and His Wife in Constant Demand as Dinner Guests.

ENTERTAINED AT TEMPLE

Plan for Thanksgiving Reception by Mrs. Griffiths to American Women Is Given Up.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, Nov. 22.—Ambassador Page spent another busy social week. On Monday the Ambassador and Mrs. Page were guests at dinner of Mr. and Mrs. T. L. Field. On Tuesday evening they were entertained at dinner by Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Graff at their house in Cumberland Place, other guests being Lady Horridge, Sir Albert Rollit, Mr. and Mrs. Jacob Lorillard, Mr. and Mrs. John Lane, M. Groitch, the Servian Minister, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Blackman, and Mrs. Ralli.

On Wednesday Mr. Page was a guest at the dinner of the Benchers of the Middle Temple, and afterward with Mrs. and Miss Page, attended the reception at the Hotel Metropole of the Japanese Ambassador to the members and guests of the Japan Society.

The Pages gave a luncheon at the embassy in Grosvenor Square on their way to Marseilles to join the yacht Niagara, chartered from Howard Gould for an extended cruise in the Mediterranean. Mrs. Colin Campbell accompanied them.

Lord and Lady Camoys went to the Continent from Claridge's on Wednesday.

Mr. and Mrs. Trafford Huteson are spending a fortnight at the Berkeley.

George T. Summerlin, Second Secretary of Legation at Peking, is en route for America on leave of absence, sailing next week.

At the Carlton Charles M. Swift and C. T. Ripley for New York arrived on Monday. James Schofield came from Scotland on Tuesday. George A. Kessler arrived from Paris on Sunday and sailed for New York on Wednesday.

At the Ritz N. Perry came from Paris on Monday. Mrs. A. Claflin and Miss Beatrice Claflin also arrived from the country the same day. R. M. Tobin arrived from New York on Tuesday. Mr. and Mrs. Duncan Ellsworth registered from New York on Wednesday.

INTEREST IN OUR SAILORS.

Paris Papers Contrast Their Pay with That in the French Navy.

By Marconi Transatlantic Wireless Telegraph to The New York Times.

PARIS, Nov. 22.—Parisians continue to be interested in American sailors, who are here on visits from the ships now at Mediterranean ports. The fact that they have money to spend contrasts strongly with the status of French sailors, and the fact is much commented upon. L'homme Libre says:

"Do not be surprised to find American sailors in the great cafés on the boulevards and also in the theatres and the best shops. They arrive in pairs with full pockets. More fortunate than the French 'matelot,' the American receives much more than a sou a day."

All the journals give details of the pay of American sailors and also comment on the quality of their fare, printing samples of the menus on board the battleships.

KAISER'S DECREE CAN'T STOP TANGO

The New Steps Have Driven the Waltz from Berlin Ballrooms.

AMERICAN SOCIAL AFFAIRS

Concert at the Women's Club—Mrs. Beach of Boston Plays at Mrs. Spiering's Musicale.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BERLIN, Nov. 22.—Society circles are enjoying a mild sensation over the announcement that the Kaiser has forbidden the officers of the army and navy to dance the one-step, the two-step, and the Tango.

It has been known for some time that Kaiser and Kaiserin were decidedly opposed to modern dances. The Prussian Court has always been most strict in these matters. It is not so many years since the waltz was tabooed, and even to-day reversing is forbidden at Court dances, the dancers being compelled to turn continually in the same direction.

It would be an error, however, to assume that the Kaiser is opposed to all dancing. The direct contrary is the case. On the occasion of the Crown Prince's marriage and again at the marriage of Princess Victoria Luise he danced tirelessly and he enjoys nothing better than an improvised dance on board the Imperial yacht Hohenzollern, when traveling. He dances extremely well. He is also fond of old-fashioned quadrilles and of the mazurka. Time and again he has been known to approach a group of officers at Court balls and remind them of their duty to see that the ladies were not left without partners.

It is unlikely that the Imperial decree will have any marked effect in checking the triumphal progress of the Tango. Three society dancing masters interviewed by THE NEW YORK TIMES correspondent were unanimous in their opinion that the Tango was too popular to suffer the slightest setback.

The new dance has already passed the point in Berlin where it can be referred to merely as a mode. It is a mania. Old-fashioned persons who have not the time to learn it find it advisable to keep off the dancing floor, since indulgence in waltzes, &c., makes them too conspicuous.

The American colony, especially, is infected, and few social gatherings are taking place that do not finish with the Tango, while many American matrons have weekly assemblies attended by a dancing master where the young folk are initiated into the mysteries of the new steps.

The week has been rather quiet socially, partly because many prominent persons are out of the city and partly because of "Busstag," (Fast Day.) One pleasant event was the reception at the American Woman's Club. Ernest Hutcheson, the American pianist, played, and among the guests were Mr. and Mrs. Walter Semon of Buffalo. Mr. Semon, who is the son of one of the proprietors of the Frankfurter Zeitung, after an extended visit here, will soon return to Buffalo. Mrs. Theodore Spiering was the hostess.

Mr. and Mrs. Spiering also entertained this week in honor of Mrs. H. A. Beach of Boston, the well-known woman composer. Mrs. Beach played one of her own sonatas, and Mrs. Eleanor Painter Schmidt of the Opera sang.

Mr. Spiering and Mrs. Beach gave a concert at Leipzig on Saturday with the Winderstein orchestra, at which a symphony and a concerto by her were given for the first time in Germany.

Mrs. Gerard has returned from Budapest, where she visited her sister. She will attend the Thanksgiving dinner here, while her husband, the Ambassador, as already announced, will go to Hamburg, where the American colony is making elaborate preparations for the day.

Mr. and Mrs. S. W. Heller, who have been motoring through Europe, are again at the Hotel Esplanade.

Other Esplanade guests include Benjamin Gibbs of Philadelphia, C. S. Steiner, Mr. and Mrs. Benedict Erstein, J. H. Erstein, and Mr. and Mrs. Bastedo, all of New York and Col. Samuel Warren Miller, U. S. A. Col. Miller is investigating the German Army rifle schools.

Mr. and Mrs. E. A. Potter of Chicago and Miss A. B. Garrett of Brooklyn are at the Kaiserhof.

The usual large number of Americans is at the Adlon and includes S. W. Hellman, Jr., the San Francisco banker, and Mrs. Hellman, who came from Paris and will remain a fortnight; John R. Williams of Philadelphia, Mr. and Mrs. F. D. Crawford of Chicago, the Misses H. E. and Lillian Walworth of Lawrence, Mass.; Wilson Post, and Miss Rae Grannis of New York.

PRINCESS YIELDS TO PARIS.

Connaught's Bride Discards British Trousseau for French Modes.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, Nov. 22.—Princess Arthur of Connaught, who returned to England this week from a Continental honeymoon, was scarcely recognized by some of her friends. Her wedding trousseau was made under the loving superintendence of her mother, the Princess Royal, who, of course, patronized British firms and followed British modes.

When Princess Arthur was in Paris, however, she was greatly taken by the French style in frocks and hats. Prince Arthur laughingly agreed to her ordering some, saying that he was sure a Paris hat would suit her admirably.

They went together to various firms in the Rue de la Paix, with the result that the Princess entirely discarded her London-made hats and dresses.

Prince Arthur, who is fond of a joke, is said to have told his wife:

"Why, your own mother won't know you!"

Harem Veil a New Paris Fashion.

By Marconi Transatlantic Wireless Telegraph to The New York Times.

PARIS, Nov. 22.—A new fashion is the half veil, not worn as some years ago leaving free the lower portion of the face, but freeing the upper part. Neck, chin, mouth, and nose are covered, leaving only the eyes free, giving the impression of a veiled harem inmate of Constantinople.

FOR CHILDS' NEWSPAPER.

Frenchman Proposes to Stimulate Good Impulses in the Young.

By Marconi Transatlantic Wireless Telegraph to The New York Times.

PARIS, Nov. 22.—Edmond Haracourt, President of the "Optimists," advocated at a recent dinner a children's newspaper which would turn the desire for excitement, change, and adventure into good, instead of bad, channels. He said:

"Go to the source to teach ethics in the school. Found for the school, even for the street, a newspaper, giving news and information of the sort to appeal to children—an energetic, adventurous novel. The child is the monkey of the man. Instead of imitating what is ugly, propose to him to imitate what is admirable."

M. Haracourt asserted that infant crime was becoming more common, not only in Paris, but in the country. Children of 12 to 16 years were committing atrocities every day—arson, burglary, and murder. There are various explanations of this persistent increase—prenatal influences, alcoholism, and tuberculosis.

Some attribute it to the non-religious education; others to the lack of any parental influence by father or mother or both. The working child is thrown on the street with vicious examples, which are contagious.

BRILLIANT WEATHER IN ROME.

Navy Officers Conspicuous in the Events of the Week.

By Marconi Transatlantic Wireless Telegraph to The New York Times.

ROME, Nov. 22.—Society is taking advantage of the glorious Indian Summer to motor about the surrounding country. In consequence the fashionable tea rooms present a rather deserted appearance on ordinary days, but Sunday, being race day, they were all crowded with well-known persons.

Mrs. White, the wife of the American Naval Attaché, was seen one evening dancing the tango with one of the American officers, and eliciting much admiration.

The Rev. Walter Lowrie, the rector of the American Church, has been entertaining at luncheon at his apartment attached to the church. On one occasion Mr. and Mrs. Tonbridge and Miss Tonbridge of Princeton were present. They will remain in Rome until the end of the year, going in January to Egypt.

S. S. McClure is at the Excelsior. He was expected at the Ambassador's dinner to the American naval officers the other evening, but was unable to be present.

Admiral Badger has asked Bishop Thomas Kennedy, the rector of the American College, to convey to his Holiness an expression of his appreciation and thanks for receiving Admirals Winslow and Beatty and himself, and Capt. W. J. Maxwell in his private library. Few personages at present, even Cardinals, receive such distinction.

Senator George T. Oliver, who has been spending some time in Rome, went to Naples where he visited the American vessels.

Capt. John J. Knapp has left his ship at Genoa to go to Milan, and, if possible, will extend his excursion to Vienna.

Capt. and Mrs. Frank Huntington Holmes, who were so popular when they spent the Winter here season before last, have returned with their charming daughter, bringing a motor car in which they purpose to explore the country surrounding Rome.

Mrs. Clarke Smith of New York has just arrived in Rome for the Winter. She is staying at the Hôtel Royal.

AMERICAN HELD IN GERMANY

Lodtmann of Chicago, Accused of Fraud, Posed as Newspaper Man.

HANOVER, Germany, Nov. 22.—Wilhelm Lodtmann, a German-American, said to be from Chicago, was arrested here to-day charged with the alleged passing of fraudulent checks.

His activities in Germany are said to have lasted over a year, during which time he posed as the correspondent of some leading New York, Boston, and other American newspapers. The checks are said to have been passed not only in Germany but in Austria, Italy, France, and Belgium.

Thursday to the American delegates to the International Convention for Safety at Sea. They are to be weekend guests of Sydney Buxton, President of the Board of Trade at his country place.

E. J. Crawford, who has booked thousands of Americans in the last eleven years as head room clerk at the Hotel Cecil, has taken the management of the Buckingham Palace Hotel.

Mrs. Price Collier and daughter have returned from Denmark and are staying for a fortnight at Brown's Hotel before sailing for New York.

Mrs. John L. Griffiths, the wife of the Consul General, has been obliged to postpone her customary reception on Thanksgiving Day to the Society of American Women in London owing to ill health.

Anthony J. Drexel was among the guests at the luncheon given by Albert Stopford at the Savoy Restaurant on Monday to the Grand Duchess Vladimir, Grand Duke Boris, and Prince Paul of Servia.

The Duke and Duchess of Roxburghe and ex-Ambassador and Mrs. James Bryce were among the guests invited to Windsor Castle during the visit of Archduke Francis Ferdinand of Austria and the Duchess von Hohenberg to the King and Queen.

Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Leiter left Claridge's for Paris on Monday on

EARL CLOSES OLD CHURCH.

Roman Catholic Peer Puts an End to Anglican Services.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, Nov. 22.—Much interest has been aroused in and around Salisbury by the action of Earl Nelson, who succeeded to the Trafalgar estates in February, in closing the ancient church of Standlynch.

He informed the vicar that he had been advised that the building was his private property for the time being and that he could not allow any Anglican services to be held there.

The little church had for centuries been used as a place of worship, according to the usages of the Church of England, but the new Lord Nelson, who is a Roman Catholic, intimates in a letter that he proposes to act upon the advice given by counsel and take possession of the building.

The late Earl, who died at the age of 90, was an Anglican churchman, and was described by the Archbishop of Canterbury, at a recent church conference, as "the Grand Old Man of the Church of England." During his long occupancy of Trafalgar he took the keenest interest in the monthly services held in the Standlynch Chapel.

NO VOTES, NO RENT, SYLVIA'S WAR CRY

Urges Her East London "Army" to Force Landlords to Help the "Cause."

POLICE AVOID A CONFLICT

Admit the Existence of an Armed Force—W. S. P. U. Disowns Miss Pankhurst.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, Nov. 22.—Sylvia Pankhurst branched out in a new direction this week. She has initiated in the East End of London a frankly Socialist campaign, of which the chief feature is a refusal to pay rent.

"Get ready for a rent strike," she advised at a crowded meeting in Canning Town. Everything else, she said, had been tried—petitions, tremendous meetings, window smashing, and burning houses—but more must be done; the suffragettes must train a people's army and must devise a way in which every one could fight, even people not strong enough to take a direct part in the army's work.

They would wait till they were quite ready, and then, all at once, all over East London, there would be a rent strike, and no rent would be paid until the vote was given. They would pay no arrears of rent after the strike was over, so it would be to the interest of the landlords to hurry it to an end. They need not fear brokers' men. What could brokers' men do against 5,000 or even 1,000 strikers? And if the poor law aid were refused to the strikers, they must just throw themselves into workhouses, which could never hold them all..

The meeting was greatly excited by reports that the police intended to arrest Sylvia.

"It will be a bad day for the police if they try to get in here," said one man. The police did not try.

Even after the meeting no one sought to arrest Sylvia, who is still at liberty, although her "Cat and Mouse" license expired four weeks ago.

The mystery of Scotland Yard's apparent inefficiency was cleared up when THE NEW YORK TIMES correspondent ascertained that detectives had been cautioned by headquarters not to run the risk of getting into a fight with the armed bodyguard, nicknamed "Sylvia's East End Army." That the so-called army is no myth was admitted by a Scotland Yard official, who, however, advised the correspondent not to take too much stock in the stories about well-drilled battalions numbering thousands.

The army consists of a gang of "toughs," some hired, others attracted by the hope of an affray with the police. According to Scotland Yard, the so-called volunteers probably do not exceed 400. The seriousness of such an admission by a police official needs no comment.

Both sexes are enrolled in the army and the husky Amazons inspire the detectives with even more nervousness than the men do, although the latter are said to be armed with whalebone staves loaded with lead at one end.

Practically no mention is made in the London papers of this condition of affairs, more appropriate in a wild Western story than in the British metropolis, although it is believed that Sylvia's plan to gather a force of hooligans will initiate a campaign of violence unequalled yet in militant annals.

The East End of London possesses a population from which such an army might conceivably be recruited if the militant war chest were sufficiently supplied with funds.

Sylvia's tactics are, however, apparently producing a little rift within the militant lute. The Women's Social and Political Union professes to disclaim all responsibility for any connection with Sylvia, and it is surmised that the regular militant organization is preparing to throw her overboard. An official told me:

"Miss Pankhurst is a free lance. We know nothing here about this East End Army."

OUR MUSICIANS SCORE.

German Critics Praise Work of Fickenscher, White, and Gittelson.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BERLIN, Nov. 22.—A musical event of unusual interest this week was the 500th production of "Tannhäuser" at the Dresden Royal Opera House. Director von Schuch presented the opera in its original form just as it was presented at its Dresden première, Oct. 19, 1845.

This version is markedly different from the present form. Venus's appearance in the third act is represented only as a vision to the mad Tannhäuser, and instead of Elizabeth's body being brought down from the Wartburg, her death is indicated only by a dramatic recitative by Wolfram and by distant tolling of bells. In the original form, too, Tannhäuser dies redeemed by Elizabeth's pure love.

This form was neither appreciated nor understood by the public in 1845, and Wagner recast the opera into its present form. Dr. von Schuch was the recipient of an ovation after the performance.

The week brought successes to a number of Americans. At the Royal Conservatory a symphonic poem for solo voices, chorus, and orchestra, by Arthur Fickenscher, a San Francisco composer, received its première. The work made a remarkable impression, prominent musicians classing it with the masterpieces of Franck and Brahms. An unusual effect was obtained by the employment of pure interval harmonies. The composer conducted his own work.

Roderick White, the violinist, brother of the author, Stewart Edward White, also won warmest praise at a concert in the Sing-Akademie. He is one of the elect, said one critic, who employed the same term to describe the work of Felix Robert Mendelssohn, a 15-year-old American cellolst, who appeared in two concerts.

Dr. Samuel Gittelson of Philadelphia has arrived in Berlin accompanied by his talented son, Frank, known in Berlin as the "young Ysaye," on an extended concert tour of German cities. Young Gittelson's recitals in Berlin this week evoked the comment by the local critics that the young Pennsylvanian was the most promising American violinist ever heard in Germany.

Franz Proschowsky and the pianist, Howard Wells, gave their first series of lectures at Herr Proschowsky's home before a large number of American music students. Herr Proschowsky gave an introductory talk on the essentials of voice culture as well as on musical phrasing. Mr. Wells will play in Nuremburg on Nov. 26 with the Nuremburg Philharmonic Orchestra at Waldenburg on Dec. 11, and at Berlin with the local Philharmonic on New Year's Day.

Frederick Hoffman, the Albany baritone, sailed on Tuesday for a short American concert tour, accompanied by his father. He expects to return in April. Mr. Hoffman, who has been living in Berlin for a year, has scored a number of notable successes. His last appearance just before sailing was at a musicale given at the home of Baron von Hunefeldt.

PANAMA CHINESE GET STAY.

Registration and Head Tax Held Up by Writ of Habeas Corpus.

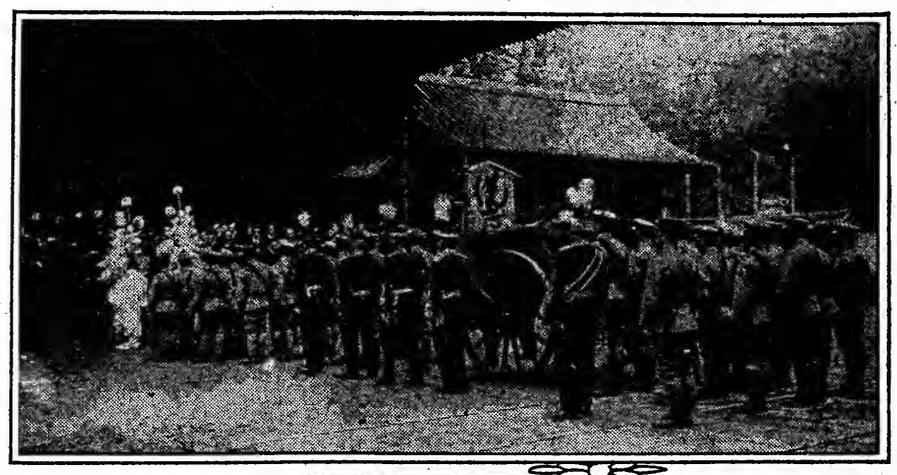
Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PANAMA, Nov. 22.—The controversy between the Republic of Panama and the Chinese Republic over the Chinese Deportation act was transferred to-day to the Supreme Court of Panama through a writ of habeas corpus obtained by representatives of the Chinese Government. This prevents Gov. Mata of the Province of Panama from carrying out the registration law requiring every Chinese to register and pay a head tax of $250 for a certificate.

The contention has been set up that the Constitution does not support the new law providing for deportation of the Chinese who refuse to comply with the order of the Governor to register. The Panama Government officials and the Governor maintain that the law is both constitutional and retroactive, and applies to all Chinese arriving here since 1904. Until the court renders a decision the enforcement of the law will not be attempted.

For the first time in a week the Chinese shops were again open to buisness to-day. They have a monopoly of the laundry and garden truck business, and the closing of their shops caused inconvenience and privation among their customers.

The Funeral of Prince Taro Katsura.



THE FUNERAL PROCESSION

IMPERIAL AND OTHER OFFERINGS LAID BEFORE THE COFFIN

TOKIO, Oct. 19.—In appreciation of the services rendered by the late Prince Taro Katsura, who died on Oct. 10 at his home at Mita, the Emperor and Empress yesterday sent to the Prince's residence officials of the Household Department to present gifts. The Emperor's gift consisted of 5,000 yen, ($2,500,) eight sets of offerings, five pieces of white silk, and two bunches of flowers, while the gift of the Empress took the form of 1,500 yen and two bunches of flowers. His Majesty also presented a eulogy which may be rendered as follows:

"Inasmuch as he early in life devoted himself to military service, later made great efforts in the cause of the country, often assisted Us in Our administration, and conducted with success treaty negotiations with the Powers, the late Prince Katsura's merits are ever distinguished. We had hoped that We might further rely upon him in the future, when We heard of his sudden death, and We cannot but grieve over it. Therefore, We dispatch Our messenger to convey Our gifts and words of condolence."

A ramarkable account of the last days of Prince Katsura is given to The Japan Advertiser by a leading Parliamentary member of the Rikken Doshi Kai, who saw the Prince many times on his deathbed. He said: "The unique character of Prince Katsura manifested itself in the most unmistakable light on his deathbed. Even the bitterest enemies of the Prince would have been profoundly touched by the heroic manner in which he bore the throes of death. Since his prostration those who attended or visited him in the sick-chamber were struck by two remarkable features in his bearing. One was the incredible vitality of his physique and the other the innate goodness of his character. Three days ago the physicians gave him up for lost, and his friends and relatives had been expecting the end every moment.

"No camphor injections nor any other medical expediency to prolong life by a few hours were resorted to; he had for some time been prepared for the worst, and there was no reason to prolong his pain unnecessarily.

"It was generally thought, even by some of his followers and worshippers, that his affable and magnetic temperament, which had endeared him to all persons coming within his influence, was his 'policy,' and that he was kind and sympathetic from will rather than heart. But that such a presumption was wholly false was eloquently demonstrated by the unchangeable geniality he showed till his last moment. Never once during his illness did he repine about himself still less his disease or death. He knew well his death was coming speedily, but he absolutely refused to be consoled. Instead of that he would console everybody, and confound every would-be sympathizer who approached him.

"On his deathbed he cheered, encouraged, and consoled every person, relative, friend, or political colleague. When I waited upon him a few days ago he looked at me with a deep, sympathetic look, as if I were the sufferer and he the comforter. The physicians and nurses were constantly cheered by the patient. The nurses in particular declared that no patient ever showed so much consideration and anxiety for them and so little for his own condition.

"The pathetic leave-taking of the five leaders of the party on Thursday morning was also characterized by the same truly sympathetic attitude on the part of the patient. He lay still, his eyes sightless, and his mouth unable to articulate. Baron Kato and Gallo, Viscount Oura, Messrs. Oishi and Kono took turns in approaching his bed; and each called his own name close to the ear of the patient. At every sound, which he evidently recognized, though feebly, he smiled and stretched out his hand to touch the person of his caller affectionately, and finally he shook the hands of all of them. There was a warm grasp in each handshake. The deep feeling of sympathy and solicitude he bore toward his friends and followers was clearly shown in his looks, and they came away deeply affected by his unselfish and sympathetic personality.

"I have never known such a patient. Even the best-tempered persons, when they are ill, are apt to wax peevish and irritable, and to behave like autocrats. Prince Katsura was till his death the kindest and most unselfish of men I ever saw."

'CROSS' OF LARKIN IS FIRING ENGLAND

effect been placed upon a new footing. Those who so believe are not confined to the Unionist Party, with whom the wish might be supposed to be father to the thought.

In to-day's Liberal Daily News, than which no stronger advocate of Home Rule for Ireland is to be found in the English press, appears an article which says:

"The forces that Larkin has released and the ideas he represents are independent of him. He is only the match that has fired the train. By the light of his conflagration we may see the realities behind the falsities of Home Rule. The political platform echoes with sectarian issues. The Orange lodges are drilling in the North and the Ancient Order of Hibernians is organizing in the South, and all the rusty weapons of the seventeenth century are being resurrected to keep alive the hateful feud.

"Then comes this uncouth figure from the ranks with his 'plague on both your houses' and reveals that behind these threadbare controversies of the past there is a latent force in Ireland that will dominate the politics of a Home Rule Parliament and submerge the sectarian issues."

After reviewing the conditions in Dublin, where the Roman Catholic Church and the Nationalist leaders were arrayed against Larkin, The Daily News concludes that this opposition to him arose from the fact that he was "turning the issues of Irish politics into new and more vital channels. The old sectarian issues were pleasing alike to the employers and the Church party machine. On both sides they do not want them to give place to a fierce revolt against social conditions. That is not the sort of ominous introduction they desire to the coming Irish Parliament, but it is with a revolt that it will be prefaced."

Complicated in this fashion, Irish Home Rule becomes a more thorny problem than ever, and, while it is difficult to suppose that the clock can be put back to the extent of undoing all the legislation, carried through in the direction of Home Rule by the Asquith Government, the Unionist hopes have grown of late in a remarkable degree.

"Redmond is not our master yet," said Austin Chamberlain this week.

The backwardness of the Government in indicating the grounds upon which it is prepared to discuss a settlement by consent of the Ulster question is taken in some quarters to mean that Mr. Asquith and his colleagues are waiting to see whether Larkin's "fiery cross" is going to fizzle out or spread a conflagration in which the structure of Home Rule for Ireland thus far erected will be reduced to ashes.

Irish Anti-Recruiting Protest.

DUBLIN, Nov. 7.—A remarkable demonstration of protest against the recruiting campaign that is being carried on by the Leinster Regiment throughout the Midlands of Ireland has been held in Athlone. A battalion of this regiment arrived in the town on a Friday, and on each of the following nights, including Sunday, the regimental band paraded the town, playing Irish airs, among them a number of what are popularly known as "rebel" tunes, such as "The Wearing of the Green." Over 1,000 persons, headed by the Athlone Pipers' band and the members of the Irish National boy scouts, marched behind the soldiers, "booing" and singing national songs, and eventually the two parties came face to face in Chapel Road. The military were immediately drawn up on each sidewalk to let the protest demonstration pass by, and ultimately were hurried into barracks, being followed up to the very gates by the Athlone Piper's band playing "A Nation Once Again."

A LESSON TO PIRATES.

Authors of "La Petite Fille" Delighted at New York Prosecution.

By Marconi Transatlantic Wireless Telegraph to The New York Times.

PARIS, Nov. 22.—André de Lorde and Pierre Chaine, authors of "La Petite Fille," playing at the Princess Theatre in New York under the title "A Pair of White Gloves," are delighted at the result of their attempt to get justice under the copyright law. M. Chaine said:

"You see, we are princes of terror, even in America, because it is apropos of one of our works that the new protection begins. Unscrupulous directors will find hereafter a salutary legal restraint.

"Our adapter was not without a certain delicacy. He changed the title of the play, renaming it 'A Pair of White Gloves.' Otherwise it is, exactly the same."

M. Lorde said:

"Quite by chance we were informed a month ago that our piece was being played in New York without the authors' names. We immediately put the matter in the hands of the French Playwrights' Society, and we hope that this example will prevent the wholesale pirating of French works, heretofore done with impunity, and encourage other authors to defend their rights under the law of April, 1910."

PRISON FOR BANK MANAGER.

Employes of Wrecked German Bank Also Get Jail Terms.

DORTMUND, Germany, Nov. 22.—After a trial lasting 114 days, Herr Ohm, Managing Director of the Niederdeutsche Bank, which failed with liabilities of $12,000,000 on July 27, 1910, was sentenced to-day to seven years' imprisonment for wrecking the institution by appropriating funds. A public accountant, Herr Hartwig, was at the same time sentenced to three years' imprisonment, and a number of other bank employes to terms of from four to six months each.

The bank had been started some years ago on a small capital, and Ohm appealed to the poorer classes to make deposits, spurring them on to do so by the use of religious quotations. Later on the capital was increased until it reached $3,000,000.

The evidence showed that Ohm had made fraudulent entries and published false balance sheets to cover up the bank's condition.

TEST TO DISCLOSE CANCER.

Dr. Robinson Declares His Method Is Infallible.

By Marconi Transatlantic Wireless Telegraph to The New York Times.

PARIS, Nov. 22.—Dr. E. Robinson, in a paper presented this week at the Academy of Medicine, which gained the prize offered for the best work on cancer, announces his method for determining cancer in the first stages. This has heretofore been very difficult, because of the confusion with tuberculosis symptoms and other growths of various kinds, not cancerous. Dr. Robinson, after experimenting on hundreds of patients, declares his method infallible.

The formula he communicated to the Academy is a hypodermic solution. Then the temperature of the patient is taken every three hours. If it mounts from half to one and one-half degrees the disease is cancer, otherwise the temperature remains stationary.

Tests have been made 300 times in Paris hospitals with satisfactory results.

GERMANY ACTIVE IN LATIN AMERICA

Raises Minister Residencies in Three Countries to Rank of Full Legations.

BALTIC EXPOSITION GRANT

Swedish World's Fair Considered More Worthy of Support Than Our Panama-Pacific One.

BERLIN, Nov. 22.—The rapid increase in the interest taken by Germany in Latin America is indicate by the provision made in the imperial budget of 1914 for the raising to the rank of full legations of the Minister residencies now accredited to the republics of Guatemala, Venezuela, and Peru and the establishment of a German Consulate at Panama. The German Consulate at Montreal, Canada, is raised to a Consulate General.

Some other striking points extracted from the preliminary summary accompanying the Budget bill are the increase in the subsidy for German schools abroad from $100,000 annually to $375,000, and appropriations for the Olympic Games to be held in Berlin in 1916 and for the German exhibit at the Baltic Exposition to be held at Malmoe, Sweden, in 1914, which is considered more worthy of support than the Panama-Pacific Exposition at San Francisco in 1915. No mention is made in the estimates of an appropriation for the German Embassy building at Washington.

Germany apparently is about to abandon her subsidy to the North German Lloyd steamship lines running to the Orient and Australasia, as the estimate of $761,250 covers only the six months until the expiration of the present contract on Oct. 1 next year.

The estimated revenue and expenditure for 1914 balance at $918,250,000, which compares with $963,500,000 in 1913, in which supplementary appropriations were included.

To the army and navy are assigned $304,250,000 and $122,000,000, respectively, making together almost half the year's total expenditure, although only two new battleships for the navy are provided for.

German Cities Anxious to Exhibit.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BERLIN, Nov. 22.—The Executive Committee of the League of German Municipalities declared to-day its readiness and desire to organize a fitting municipal exhibition at the San Francisco World's Fair provided the Reichstag would assist with an appropriation. Over-Burgomaster Wermuth presided at the meeting.

MISS PETERSON'S SUCCESS.

American Girl Has Won the Hearts of Paris Operagoers.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, Nov. 22.—May Esther Peterson, an American girl, who recently made her successful début in Paris opera in the rôle of Lakmé at the Théâtre Gaîté Municipale, has been engaged for one of the twelve concerts to be given by the Philharmonic Society, thus attesting the genuineness of her success, as others on the Philharmonic list are Ysaye, Kreisler, and Kubelik.

Miss Peterson is holding receptions at the theatre nightly, and crowds are at the stage door demanding to know the next rôle she will sing.

Last Sunday she was almost the victim of a serious accident, which further endeared her to temperamental Parisians. While singing a duet in the first act, the curtain fell suddenly, just missing her head by the fraction of an inch. The crowd began vociferously to ask if she was hurt. She was finally brought before the curtain by the management. The next rôle to be given her will probably be Manon.

CHRISTMAS SURPRISES AT LAMBERTS'

Coming to Lamberts' for Christmas Jewelry you may expect many surprises, chief of which is the surprise of low prices. They are all expressed in plain figures, which look you squarely in the eye, as if challenging you to match them at any other jewelry store in town.

Lamberts' low prices for all Diamond and Solid Gold Jewelry, Diamond and Solid Gold Rings, Solid Gold, Gold-Filled and Sterling Silver Watches, and Sterling Silverware in all forms and fashions are explainable in a paragraph:

We are large manufacturers and spot cash buyers of whatever we do not make. We are direct importers of Diamonds, Opera Glasses and other foreign products. We never deal with middlemen. By sticking to a neighborhood where rents are low we avoid the need of swelling prices with the costs of an expensive store.

Diamond Surprises Explained

Despite all we have said to prepare customers for low prices for Christmas diamonds, including those in the Solid 14-karat and 18-karat Gold Engagement Rings here pictured, we hear words of astonishment every day as customers see for themselves the Diamonds of fine color we sell at small figures. "How do you manage it?" we are asked. By looking ahead, buying largely in anticipation of increased duty, paying spot cash for large quantities of Diamonds and mounting them in our own factory. The economy thus attained gives unequalled values in diamonds.

Engagement Rings from $10.00 to $1,500, and in two stone, three stone and cluster rings, and in combination rings, wherein the diamonds unite their beauty with that of sapphires, emeralds and other precious stones.

Fashionable Pendants & Lavallieres

Introducing you to three fine Lambert Lavallieres and you can make the acquaintance of a brilliant company of others at the Lambert store. Possession of any one would cost you far more than we ask if middleman's profit were to pay, but it never is to pay at Lamberts'. The Lavalliere on the extreme left is a stylish arrangement in Platinum, original Lambert design, with 21 diamonds and 3 square cut sapphires, and we let you have it for $136—and a rare value it is. Next to the Platinum Lavalliere is one in solid 14 karat gold with 3 sapphires and 3 pearls for $10.50, and the quaintly fashioned one on the right, solid 14 karat gold with 1 diamond, 1 sapphire and 5 whole pearls, and sells for $10.00.

Solid gold Neck Chains, $2.00 up; Platinum Neck Chains, $6.00 up.

DUCHESS LEADS WAR FOR SWEATED WOMEN

In Conference at Sunderland House Workers Reveal Industrial Horrors.

TELL TALES OF OPPRESSION

Duchess of Marlborough Presides Over Committee to Help Organize Women Tailors.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, Nov. 22.—The Duchess of Marlborough's conference this week on sweated workers and trade boards at Sunderland House, the Duchess's town residence, brought home to the public in sledgehammer fashion the shocking industrial conditions that are widely prevalent in England—conditions unparalleled even in New York's worst east side sweatshops.

Thousands of sweated women, averaging 2 to 4 cents an hour, are unable, with the hardest kind of work and almost inhuman hours, to eke out more than $2 a week, and too often it is less.

For years the National Anti-Sweating League, the Women's Trades Union League, and other organizations have waged a campaign against the sweating system with the result that Parliament passed the Trade Boards act in 1909, making is possible for the compulsory establishment of a living minimum wage in certain industries by Trade Boards, composed of workers, employers, and outsiders.

It was at first tried on the chainmaking, lace-finishing, paper boxmaking, and tailoring industries, where the conditions had long been a scandal, and met with such remarkable success that the minimum wage being fixed the old maximum rates were doubled and often trebled.

As a result the Trade Boards act has just been extended to the confectionery, shirtmaking, metal, hollow ware, linen, and cotton embroidery industries; but as it is harder to enforce legal minimum rates than to fix them and hard even to fix them where workers are unorganized and consequently physically unable to take advantage of the extension of the Trade Boards act, the National Anti-Sweating League enlisted the sympathies and active co-operation of the Duchess of Marlborough. As a result of this a general purposes committee was organized with the Duchess as Chairman and the conference at Sunderland House was held to enlist public support and raise funds to organize the sweated workers, protect their interests, and expedite the establishment of trade boards in four new industries which are to be brought within the scope of the act.

The opportunity to see the interior of the palatial Marlborough residence in Curzon Street acted as a magnet on more than 500 persons, mostly women. All were directed up the magnificent marble staircase between a double line of footmen, gorgeous in crushed strawberry plush knee-breeches, powdered hair, and white silk stockings, to the grand ballroom, which probably never in its history had presented such a scene.

In the front row on the platform between the Earl of Lytton and the Bishop of Oxford sat the Duchess of Marlborough, wearing an exquisite toilette of black velvet with white silk lapels. A curious minaret effect was obtained with the skirt by a wide flounce of black of pleated ribbon above the knees.

Behind her in a semi-circle sat a living exhibit of the sweating system—twelve women from as many industries, dressed up for the occasion in their poor-best and forming interesting types of England's industrious poor.

They sat stiffly, awkwardly, stolidly, and impassive during the preliminary speeches, only their eyes darting furtively about at the splendors of the grand ballroom—the colored marbles, the paneling, the frescoed ceiling, the crystal chandeliers, and the marble cupids.

Then, when their turn came, they told in a few simple sentences, one after another, a tragedy of industrial life. First came a gaunt, gray-haired woman, wearing a thin white shawl and an old bonnet with white paper roses. She said that she had been a chain worker for fifty-two years. Holding up a long, heavy chain, she explained that she used to be paid only 84 cents a hundred links as against $1.70 now, since the chain-making industry had been brought under the operation of the Trade Boards act.

A woman, working twenty years in a candy factory, said that she had never earned more than $2 a week.

A sad-faced woman, the mother of three children, held up parts of a child's boot and explained that working as hard as she could from 6 o'clock in the morning till 10 at night she could earn only a little over $2 a week.

The Duchess of Marlborough was keenly interested when told by THE NEW YORK TIMES correspondent that there was a nation-wide protest in America against sweatshops, underpaid salesgirls, child labor, and other industrial evils. She said:

"Of course, I do not know what the conditions are in New York, but here the sweating system is a question of national importance. Exaggeration is the very last thing one wishes. The realities are so overwhelming. Thousands of women and girls are suffering from actual hunger, although working every available hour the year through. Many under-paid women workers in London are forced to make their morning meal of a little weak tea, bread, and dripping, and buy an unsatisfactory, unwholesome dinner for a copper or two. The conditions under which the home workers labor are even more distressing."

ISAACS HEARS BIG SUIT.

Slander Case Involving a Curate Attracts Wide Attention.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, Nov. 22.—An action for slander heard in the courts this week has attracted widespread public interest and more than usual attention in legal circles on account of it being the first big case tried before the new Lord Chief Justice, Sir Rufus Isaacs.

Action had been brought by the Rev. Thomas Ghent, a London curate, to obtain damages from Arthur FitzGerald, a Police Sergeant, who alleged that the curate has misconducted himself several times with Mrs. FitzGerald. The case occupied Sir Rufus for nine days, and at the end the jury were unable to agree on a verdict.

It was alleged that the acts of which Ghent was accused were committed, among other places, in the church itself, and as evidence of his relations with Mrs. FitzGerald letters were produced, written by her to him.

In the course of the trial it was disclosed that Sergt. FitzGerald, fifteen years ago, made similar charges against another curate to whom Mrs. FitzGerald also sent letters. The Bishop of London held an inquiry and the clergyman was pronounced innocent.

On behalf of Ghent it was suggested that Mrs. FitzGerald was a hysterical woman, suffering from a diseased imagination. It was pointed out that Ghent's record was unblemished, and this was supported by clerical friends, who, it is believed, are helping to defray the expenses of the trial in order to give the curate the opportunity of clearing his character. He is also supported by his wife, whose faith in him remains unshaken.

Sir Rufus Isaacs, in summing up, spoke four hours, and the courts have seldom heard a more lucid and detailed presentation of facts to a jury. He dwelt particularly upon the important bearings the case would have upon the duties performed by clergymen, doctors, and other persons who by their callings are brought into communication with women.

ENSIGN UNABLE TO MARRY.

Officer's Plans Upset by Illness of Fiancee and Himself.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, Nov. 22.—The hard luck of Ensign Frederick Stewart Bryant of the United States Navy in failing in his attempt to get married here this week has aroused considerable good-humored sympathy.

The romance dates from his midshipman days at Annapolis. Young Bryant, who is on board the battleship Delaware at present in the Mediterranean, obtained fifteen days' leave of absence, hastened to London, and joined his fiancée, Miss Yvonne Brock, daughter of C. J. Brock of Swansea.

It was to have been another one of the American Embassy's personally conducted marriages, and the Archbishop of Canterbury had issued a special license. Then the prospective bride was taken ill with the measles. The intending bridegroom also became ill with measles on the following day.

The fifteen days' leave of absence was over before both were sufficiently recovered to be married, and Ensign Bryant was forced to rejoin his ship.

It is said that the marriage will probably take place at Norfolk, Va., next Spring.

WELL, BUT IN BED 55 YEARS.

Mlle. Lecaux's Refusal to Leave Her Couch Is Unexplained.

By Marconi Transatlantic Wireless Telegraph to The New York Times.

PARIS, Nov. 22.—Mlle. Lecaux, who has for seventy-five years been living in the environs of Paris and in perfectly good health, has remained abed for fifty-five years. The reason is unknown. Some say it is hypochondria, others assign love affairs as the cause; but, be that as it may, in 1858 she made her decision.

A caller investigating the case was shown into a white room, containing a bed in a wooden alcove closed by white curtains, like a sepulchre.

The family objected to the visit, saying that she was in bad humor, and her authoritative voice, strong and healthy, gave evidence of the fact. She then ordered dinner—radishes, mutton, and black coffee.

Several doctors who have visited her report that her digestion is admirable. Her limbs are only slightly feebic from disuse.

MACHINE MOCKS NOISES.

All Sorts of Combinations Made Possible for Theatrical Use.

By Marconi Transatlantic Wireless Telegraph to The New York Times.

PARIS, Nov. 22.—Marseilles, which gave the world a machine for roasting chestnuts, has again shown its inventive genius in a machine designed to make all sorts of noises for use in the theatres and moving picture shows.

By means of multiple electric combinations it imitates the noise of horses' hoofs, wind storms, thunder, sobbing waves, swaying branches, passing trains, and also the familiar nursery clatter.

ARREST ALSATIAN SOLDIERS

Military Authorities Accuse Them of Divulging Garrison Secrets.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BERLIN, Nov. 22.—An Alsatian Sergeant-Major and nine Alsatian privates are under military arrest at Zabern, accused of giving information to newspapers concerning garrison affairs.

Lieut. Baron von Forstner, whose recent slighting remarks about the townspeople and the French flag started the present troubles, has been transferred to another company, undoubtedly as a punishment.

KAISERIN FIGHTS ENEMIES OF CHURCH

Agitation Going On in Prussia for Withdrawal from the State Institution.

MEETINGS WERE FORBIDDEN

Arranged for Last Wednesday, Repentance Day, and Prohibition Is Said to Have Been Due to Empress.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BERLIN, Nov. 22.—It is in the rôle of an exemplary housewife, mother, and protectress of various charitable and religious organizations that the Germans are accustomed to regard the Kaiserin, but her Majesty appeared in a new rôle this week—that of a champion of the State Church. According to reports as yet uncontradicted she has departed from her custom by interesting herself for the first time in State affairs.

About three months ago a so-called Committee of the Confessionless was formed to agitate for withdrawals from the State Church. The withdrawal movement, which had already attained considerable proportions, has been increasing rapidly since then. To further the propaganda, the committee arranged twelve mass meetings to be held last Wednesday, at which the speakers should advocate general withdrawals from the Church. The choice of the day displeased even a great many persons whose sympathy for the Evangelical Church is small, since Wednesday was Repentance Day—one of the most solemn of the church holy days in the entire year.

The police of some of the greater Berlin municipalities granted permission for the meetings, while the Police President of Berlin proper refused to allow the meetings scheduled in the old city, and took the unusual step of notifying the police heads of the other municipalities of his action. Thereupon the latter revoked the permission granted by them. It is now reported that the prohibition of the meetings was directly due to the action of the Kaiserin, whose deep religious convictions were outraged by the choice of Wednesday for the agitation.

It is also understood that her Majesty conferred with a number of dignitaries as to the possibility of taking steps to oppose the growing withdrawal movement and suggested, among other remedies, the possibility of increasing to a prohibitive figure the fees payable by persons desiring to withdraw. At present the fees for withdrawal, which involves a formal notarial action, are 4 marks, or $1. It is reported that the Kaiserin favors an increase to at least 100 marks, or $25, and that the matter may be brought up at the coming session of the Prussian Diet.

The immediate result of the Kaiserin's intervention, however, was not encouraging. The Committee of the Confessionless simply postponed its meetings until Thursday, and, as a result of the advertising obtained through the police prohibition, the attendance was much larger than would otherwise have been the case.

A great number of those present signed declarations of their intention to withdraw from the Church, and hundreds of others are likely to do so in the near future. The exact number of withdrawals since the committee began its agitation is unknown, but it runs high into the thousands, and the movement is gathering impetus every month.

A great number of wtihdrawals are due simply to the desire to escape the payment of the church taxes, which are collected by the state, but thousands feel that the Church is only a Government department permeated with formalism, and that the only way to bring about the separation of Church and State is by withdrawing.

The Social Democrats, whose party platform declares that religion is each man's private affair, have taken a leading part in the agitation.

Opposition to the movement has thus far been confined to moral suasion by clergymen and isolated police action, as, for instance, the confiscation of the committee's placards announcing the places where the printed forms for a declaration of withdrawal were purchasable.

Indications are beginning to multiply, however, that the authorities are seriously concerned by the movement. Both the Kaiser and the Kaiserin are deeply religious. Moreover, the Church is one of the chief props of the Throne, and it is expected that the rulers will do everything possible to check a movement that is so dangerous.

Some of the German States have already made certain concessions, impelled by the withdrawal movement, especially along the line of permitting the children of dissenting parents to receive the prescribed compulsory religious instruction from non-sectarian ministers. Thus far, however, Prussia resolutely clings to the compulsory orthodox religious instructions for school children.

MARY CURZON HOSTEL OPEN

Queen Alexandra Inaugurates Memorial to American Vicereine.

By Marconi Transatlantic Wireless Telegraph to The New York Times.

LONDON, Nov. 22.—The memory of the American Vicereine of India, as the late Lady Curzon was incorrectly called, was commemorated to-day by the opening of the Mary Curzon Hostel by Queen Alexandra.

The Duchess of Marlborough and Lord Curzon received her Majesty.

The Duchess said the hostel, which is the first of a series to be opened in London as lodging-houses for women on the lines of the Rowton homes for men, was a fitting memorial to Lady Curzon, who generously spent her life improving the condition of women.

Lord Curzon, who also spoke, paid a tribute to his late wife's labors to alleviate the lot of women.

BRIGHTEST AT 40 TO 56.

Men Show Marked Differences In Age of Greatest Brilliancy.

By Marconi Transatlantic Wireless Telegraph to The New York Times.

PARIS, Nov. 22.—Recent medical statistics as to the age when man has the most intellectual vigor give interesting results. It is from forty to fifty-six years that the most brilliant things have been accomplished by the majority of human beings.

Chemists and physicians have made brilliant discoveries at forty. Poets have accomplished masterpieces at forty-four, and novelists two years later. Famous warriors average forty-seven, musicians are most brilliant at forty-eight, and actors at the same age. Moralists are greatest at fifty-one, politicians at fifty-three, humorists at fifty-six, thus demonstrating that the last thing one learns is how to amuse one's contemporaries.

M'COMBS'S REMARK ANNOYED FRENCH

He Said He Was in Paris "Incognito"—"Why a Private Citizen Incognito?" Is Asked.

BUT NO PERSONA NON GRATA

Any One Wilson Nominates Will Be Accepted — Washington Mean Over New Embasey Furniture.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, Nov. 22.—With the marriage of W. F. McCombs the question as to who will succeed Ambassador Herrick is again foremost in American circles here.

There have been several reports. A current report is that Mr. McCombs is persona non grata at the Quai d'Orsay on account of his previously refusing the post. It is also rumored that Frederick Allen may get the appointment.

THE NEW YORK TIMES correspondent has called on several important sources of news of this character, where it is the unwritten law that the person giving the information must never be quoted. The rumor concerning Mr. McCombs may be dismissed as incorrect, although not absurd. It is stated that relations are so friendly between the Quai d'Orsay and Washington that any one receiving the appointment of President Wilson would get a welcome here. However, it is hinted in some quarters that the welcome might be more cordial if the appointee were not Mr. McCombs.

The reason assigned for Mr. McCombs's lack of popularity in French circles is not that he once refused the appointment, but his long visit in France, which, to the French mind, was for the purpose of "looking them over to see if he liked them."

The French, considering themselves quite as good as anybody else, resent being investigated. Mr. McCombs also made the unfortunate remark while here that he was "incog." French statesmen are all democratic, and many are of the bourgeoisie. They therefore could not understand how a private citizen of the American Republic could be "incog."

The news has transpired in American circles that the report that Mrs. McCombs received $1,000,000 as a wedding gift from the Leiters is erroneous, and that Mr. Leiter is too much engaged in his own business affairs to bestow a million at the present time.

The report that Frederick Allen is likely to receive the appointment is not considered seriously in the American colony. Prominent Americans believe that President Wilson is not likely to molest Ambassador Herrick for some time, especially as in all his dealing Mr. Herrick has put his position above party politics, serving quite as loyally under President Wilson as under the Republicans.

Apropos of embassy affairs, the staff is wondering whether the State Department is ever going to allow the few hundred dollars necessary to buy furniture for the new embassy offices in the Rue de Chaillot, near the Trocadéro, which occupy the same site, although in a fine new building, as forty years ago, when Washburn was Minister.

The offices were moved from the Avenue Kléber eight months ago. Some of the furniture was so old that Mr. Herrick decided to leave it behind, especially as it would look dingy and out of place in the new surroundings; also, as the new offices were much larger and needed new furnishings.

The application to Washington for a furniture appropriation went unheeded. Several reports are circulating in Paris. One is that the reply came:

"Let Herrick buy it. He can afford it."

Naturally, Mr. Herrick decided that it was not part of his job. The second report is that Secretary of State Bryan sent word that there would be a furniture appropriation when the new Ambassador came, so as to allow him the glory of making a selection.

Whatever the truth of the matter, the condition reflects no additional credit on America, which is already criticised for not owning its embassies, for, although the walls of the present embassy are done in beautiful designs and colors, the floors are minus carpets. There are scarcely enough chairs for visitors, and there is a woeful lack of desks and other necessities for the executive staff.

Ambassador Herrick has been doing the entire work of the embassy single-handed for the past ten days. All the secretaries are absent. Warren Robbins, the Third Secretary, is in Sweden on account of the death of his stepfather, Price Collier. Second Secretary Sheldon Whitehouse returned after an illness, and received a month's leave of absence in which to recuperate in Switzerland.

The Ambassador told THE NEW YORK TIMES correspondent that he had refused all invitations for Thanksgiving Day, and intended to eat his turkey at home surrounded by his family, his only guests being the embassy attachés. He will, however, attend the dinner of the American Society on Thanksgiving Eve, and the Harvard Club dinner on the Saturday night following.

ELLIOTT'S ARREST ANGERS DAUGHTER

Calls It an Outrage and Diabolical Plot by Enemies Unknown to Her.

POLICE REFUSE TO TALK

Hearing of Charges in East Grinstead Court Held Behind Closed Doors, Reporters Being Excluded.

By Marconi Transatlantic Wireless Telegraph to The New York Times.

LONDON, Nov. 22.—John Love Elliott, who was arrested on Thursday night and lodged in Lewes Jail after a hearing of charges in camera, is declared by one of his two daughters to be the victim of a dastardly plot.

Elliott began to occupy Hammerwood House, a magnificent mansion in 600 acres of park, five months ago. For two years he had resided with his daughters, Doris, aged 18, and Florence, aged 17, in apartments in Cavendish Square in the West End of London. Doris, when seen in London to-night, did not appear worried, but was bitterly indignant over her father's arrest and detention in jail, which, she believed, was due to the machinations of some enemy or enemies.

"It is all a mistake," said she, "and I am sure he will be released in a few days. He has engaged the very best lawyers, who have told me not to worry and that everything will be all right. I did not know he had any enemies, and I'm sure I don't know who they can be, but it is an outrage and a diabolical plot. Such a thing couldn't happen in America, but they don't know him in this country."

The secrecy surrounding the whole affair continues to be maintained by the authorities. No information of any kind was obtainable to-day at Scotland Yard, where the officials of the Criminal Identification Bureau told THE NEW YORK TIMES representative that Chief Inspector Fowler alone knew the full details of the case as he had handled it personally. The police of East Grinstead profess equal ignorance as to the facts. The Sergeant at headquarters said he only knew what he had read in a meagre account appearing in one of the London morning papers. They were not concerned with the affair as the arrest had been planned and executed entirely by Scotland Yard.

The hearing in the East Grinstead court yesterday was held in private, even the local newspaper men being excluded.

Mason-Seaman Taxi Service

For many years the Mason-Seaman Transportation Company has given to the people of New York a Taxicab service that stands for the nearest possible approach to perfection.

This standard of service has been possible at a moderate price owing to our enormous volume of business.

Recent legal decisions instruct us to reduce these prices.

In order to do so and still maintain the high order of our public service, it is necessary to still further increase this volume of business.

We believe that the best way to do this is to tell the public the reasons why M-S taxi service commands their consideration—why it deserves the hearty co-operation of the riding public, individuals, clubs, restaurants, etc.

Few people realize the immensity of the Mason-Seaman organization—and its tremendous facilities.

The primary advantage of Mason-Seaman service is in its unquestioned reliability, which is an absolute guarantee to you against all hazards through accident, theft or carelessness.

It is the largest taxicab company in the United States, with a pay roll of $20,000 a week. Its main garage covers several acres of valuable city property and can house over eighteen hundred automobiles at one time. An impressive element of safety in this building is the absence of elevators; our taxis being run under their own power up inclined runways from floor to floor.

Its machine shops are a complete automobile factory, in which entire cars are built and rebuilt. These shops have separate sub-shops for the building of bodies, the building of chassis and engines complete, the reconstruction of lamps, the reupholstering of interiors—and in fact for every branch of automobile manufacture.

It is the completeness of these repair shops that enables us to keep M-S cars always traveling. They leave our garages in such perfect condition that trouble on the road is the rarest of rare conditions.

Our own garages and branch stations in almost every part of the city assure you the promptest service, no matter from what part of New York your call reaches our great central station, which is Columbus 7400. Whether your call comes from Fourteenth Street or 125th Street, a message to this 'phone is immediately relayed over private wires to the station nearest you and a cab dispatched without delay.

Our taxicabs are all French cars—Delahaye and Darracq. They are elegant in all appointments, immaculately clean and subjected to every sanitary cleansing process necessary to keep them so. Their bodies are maroon and black, a combination that is both harmonious and unostentatious.

In case of storms or other conditions that may make it impossible to send a cab immediately, our operators tell you instantly and frankly within what space you may reasonably expect a cab. If there is no chance of filling your order promptly they tell you so.

Within the past thirty-five months we have returned through our Lost and Found Department more than $250,000 worth of articles left in our cabs. This is but another evidence of the dependable character of this organization.

Our chauffeurs are courteous and of an unusual capacity, both personally and as drivers. They are only engaged after a most rigid examination and investigation as to character, habits, and experience, and even then are required to serve a period on approbation—before being considered a part of our regular force.

This mention of our superb facilities is made to impress you with the advantages of a taxi service—possible only to such an organization as this.

Our charge cards allow those who carry them the privilege and convenience of a charge account with us.

M-S These letters in gold on every door M-S

These letters are the insignia of perfect taxi service—every Mason-Seaman taxicab bears this one distinguishing mark for the benefit of those who seek taxi service as good as is humanly possible to render. Look for these letters on a car and you assure yourself of every taxicab convenience, with absolutely no inconveniences or unpleasant possibilities.

Wherever you find a line of taxis, you will find one or more with a M-S on the door. Look for it for your own protection.

NEW TAX WORRIES AMERICANS ABROAD

Nobody Seems to Know Just How the Impost on Incomes Affects Him.

FEAR TO LOSE CITIZENSHIP

But Americans Feel Law Is Unfair to Those Who Earn Their Living Away from Home.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, Nov. 22.—Many members of the American colony were thrown into consternation this week by the rapidity with which the home Government is insisting on immediate returns regarding that portion of the Income Tax law which is now effective. The result is that the Consulate General is flooded with inquiries, and the American Chamber of Commerce delegated its Legal Committee to hold a special meeting to study the law and draw up a pamphlet giving adequate information.

Many prominent American residents having interest due from American securities were amazed when they received their coupons with the percentage for income tax deducted.

The first case to appear at the Consulate General was that of a well-known society man with a draft from a New York bank for $22, representing interest on a certain investment, from which 22 cents had been deducted.

THE NEW YORK TIMES correspondent talked with various members of the Chamber of Commerce after the meeting. All declared that there were many inconsistencies in the law, and also that certain portions applying to Americans residing abroad would be impossible to enforce, thus having the effect of nullifying them.

Such being the case, a more important question arises—how the matter will affect the citizenship of Americans abroad if they do not heed the Federal law. The general feeling is that the law is unfair to foreign residents, especially as the income tax laws now in force in certain foreign countries hit Americans equally as hard as the citizens or subjects of whatever nation is concerned.

THE NEW YORK TIMES correspondent has learned, however, on high authority that the proposed French Income Tax bill now before the legislative bodies is not likely to pass, so, that being the case, Americans in Paris will have only the home laws to worry about for some time anyway.

The reason given THE NEW YORK TIMES correspondent for the probable failure of the French bill was the recent big loans necessary to meet the budget necessities, which caused the banks to take the position that the only way to arrange loans was to forget the income tax.

The entire explanation, however, is based on the trait in the French character which resents interference in private affairs. A Frenchman is willing to pay an indirect tax, such as is secured through the State match, cigar, and spirits industries. He is also willing to pay the customs charged on foodstuffs entering the cities, but the Government that proposes to examine the books of his business is quite likely to fail. Therefore, little is heard nowadays of the income tax, although the bill succeeded in getting as far as the Senate.

Prominent members of the American Chamber of Commerce are asking enlightenment from Washington. It is pointed out that the first inconsistency in the law is the fact that the income of American citizens living abroad, no matter how long they have been away from home or whether they earn their entire income outside the United States, is taxed just the same as if earned in New York. For example, there are now fifty-two American dentists in Paris, the majority of whom have no property in America and no business connections there. Information is desired as to how these persons can be reached by the Tax Department; also, if the dentists decide against payment, whether America's lack of power to enforce the law would nullify it.

The second inconsistency is that every person is supposed to make returns to the Internal Revenue Collector of his district. It is asked how Americans in Paris are going to find this individual, inasmuch as America has no civil authority in France.

The third question is: What does America purpose to do in the way of fair treatment for her citizens who are already caught in the income tax net of foreign Governments?

It is declared that Germany has the only clear and fair treatment in such cases. The German law recently enacted provides that Germans outside Germany and for two years domiciled in another country are only liable to income tax on holdings within the Fatherland.

A question also to be asked is: If Americans are ungetatable, how is that fact to affect their citizenship, especially in the case of naturalized Americans who have lived for years abroad?

The American colony in Paris numbers nearly fifteen thousand, the majority having holdings in America. The inquiries of THE NEW YORK TIMES correspondent indicate that there will be several test cases in the form of suits instituted in America before the income tax as applied to Americans abroad gets into working order.

TAX GATHERER AT THE FEAST

Innocent Legal Hitch Nearly Spoils Rome Luncheon to Ambassador.

By Marconi Transatlantic Wireless Telegraph to The New York Times.

ROME, Nov. 22.—When Mrs. Clara J. Heyland, formerly Miss Jessup of Philadelphia, died a few years ago she left her beautiful Roman residence, the Villa Aurelia, to the American Academy in Rome on the condition that it be made the seat of the institution. This was refused and it reverted to Mr. Jessup of Philadelphia, her brother, who paid the death duties. Later, through a compromise, the property was bought by the academy from Mr. Jessup and became the residence of the Director.

In Italy the death duties are much higher for an heir who is not a relative, so the Government, hearing that the acade was in possession after all, insisted on the payment of the difference between the two duties, which was put at $7,000.

This bit of history is the prelude to a piece of comedy which was enacted here the other day.

Mrs. Jesse Benedict Carter, wife of the head of the academy, had invited Ambassador and Mrs. Page to luncheon. The hour approached. The house was in order, the cook was ready, and nothing was lacking but the guests, when a shabby person appeared and insisted on seeing Mrs. Carter. He announced that he had come to serve an injunction and sequestrate the furniture or obtain the payment of $7,000.

All remonstrances were in vain. The furniture in the dining room, at least, was a necessity and as $7,000 is not usually kept in one's pocket, Mrs. Carter had to sign a paper pledging herself to see that matters were settled within twenty-four hours.

The guests, who included, besides the Ambassador and his wife, Dr. Ashby, the head of the British School of Archaeology, and Mr. and Mrs. Hendrick of Yale, were received by a calm and smiling hostess and little imagined how near they had come to losing a good lunch for luck of things to eat it on.

It seems that some legal point had been neglected, and hence the unpleasant surprise. However, if any one has to pay it will be Mr. Jessup, as the villa was bought with the stipulation that all duties, &c., should be cleared.

Mrs. Carter had to meet the crisis alone, as Prof. Carter is in America. Mr. Hendrick is here with his wife and son to assume Prof. Carter's position as the head of the Classical School for the Winter.

COMING ON THE LUSITANIA.

Railway Men, Designer, and Essayist Among the Passengers.

By Marconi Transatlantic Wireless Telegraph to The New York Times.

LONDON, Nov. 22.—Among the passengers who sailed from Liverpool to-day on the Lusitania was Charles Allom, who goes to design the interior of the Widener Memorial Library at Harvard. Allom was at one time mentioned as likely to challenge for the America's Cup in place of Sir Thomas Lipton.

Other passengers were A. H. Stanley, managing director of the London Underground, and Sir Guy Granet, Chairman of the Midland Railway.

Miss Lind af Hageby, anti-vivisectionist, was also aboard. She said the cost of her recent libel suit, $30,000, has been entirely reimbursed by public subscription.

Francis Grierson, essayist, goes on a lecturing tour.

NOBLE AVIATION RECRUITS.

LONDON, Nov. 10.—Flying is being taken up enthusiastically, though a little late in the day, both in the army and navy, and "younger sons" in the aristocracy are among the keenest recruits. Among the latest members of noble houses who have taken out their pilots' certificates are Lord George Wellesley, youngest son of the Duke of Wellington, who was born in 1889, and Lord Edward Arthur Grosvenor, a younger son, born 1892, of the first Duke of Westminster by his second marriage. Both are in the army, and both took out their certificates within a month of their first flights.

Lord George Wellesley, who is a Lieutenant in the Grenadier Guards, is more than 6 feet tall, but his height is no drawback to flying, for he is slightly built. He learned to fly on a Bristol Military Standard aeroplane at Salisbury. He is a great-grandson of the first Duke. Lord Edward Grosvenor took only three weeks to get his certificate after learning on a Bristol biplane. Though a Lieutenant in the Royal Horse Guards, he is attached to the airship section of the Flying Corps at Farnborough.

German Army Dirigible on 250-Mile Trip—Another Building for Navy.

FRIEDRICHSHAFEN, Germany, Nov. 22.—The most modern of Zeppelin dirigible airships, the Zeppelin VI., intended for the service of the German army, ascended from Lake Constance to-day and started on her first trip, during which she will try to reach Gotha, about 250 miles due north.

Work is being pushed forward on the new naval Zeppelin which is to replace the one destroyed in the catastrophe at Johannisthal on Oct. 17, when the entire crew of twenty-eight officers and men were killed. The airship under construction embodies all those improvements believed by experts necessary to obviate such accidents as that which caused the recent disaster.

Reformed Socialists as Senators.

ROME, Nov. 22.—The list of new Senators which Premier Giolitti will submit to the King, it is reported, will include the names of two Reformed Socialists, who, if they are nominated by the King, will be the first of that party to enter the Senate. One of them, Alfredo Bertesi, has been a Deputy for eighteen years. He was once a baker. He was very active during the days of Obstruction, when Gen. Pelloux was head of the Cabinet.

"BIG BUSINESS" MUST STAY

And Punishment of Wrongdoers Must Be Avoided Whenever Possible—Anti-Trust Suits Futile.

SANTIAGO, Chile, Nov. 22.—Theodore Roosevelt, who arrived here last evening, paid a visit to-day to the President of the Republic, Ramon Barros Luco, who greeted him cordially. Proceeding to the University of Chile, Col. Roosevelt was welcomed by Don Marcial Martinez, formerly the Chilean Minister at Washington. Col. Roosevelt delivered an address, and later received at the hands of the Rector a diploma of honorary membership.

In his address, Col. Roosevelt took for his topic "The Democratic Movement in a Republic," and he spoke before the oldest institution for higher education on the continent. His review of the democratic movement in the United States was confined mainly to the twelve years since he first became President. He explained his views regarding the judiciary and "big business," speaking in part as follows:

"The movement with which during the last twelve years I have been associated has consisted merely in applying to the conditions of the present day, in actual fact, the principles of the founder of the Republican Party, Abraham Lincoln, and in bringing to the task before us the purposes not only of Abraham Lincoln but of Thomas Jefferson, the founder of the Democratic Party. The political and financial leaders of the old parties still paid lip service to these principles and purposes, but it was lip service merely, and these leaders resented as party disloyalty the effort to translate into deeds the exact words which they were only too glad to use as long as they remained words only. I believe that the effort to which I and those associated with me are committed, is in its essence chiefly an effort to turn words into deeds, and that it is emphatically a movement in the interest of the plain people, in the interest of the rank and file of both the old parties, as against the political and financial machines which have dominated them.

"During the last half of the nineteenth century the leaders of reaction in the United States, political and financial alike, gradually grew to recognize in the judiciary their most powerful potential ally. There was very little actual corruption on the bench; on the contrary, our Judges have been on the whole both able and upright public servants, standing on a level probably higher than that of any other civil servants of the Government. As long as they confine themselves to the exercise of judicial functions they perform their duties at least as well as, probably better than, other public servants perform theirs. But their whole training, and the aloofness of their position on the bench, prevent their having, as a rule, any real knowledge of, or understanding sympathy with, the lives and needs of the ordinary hardworking toiler. There are many honorable exceptions; but this is the rule.

"In consequence, their tendency is to be ultra-conservative in all matters where the fancied rights of property are invoked on behalf of the big privileged interests as against human rights, as against the ordinary rights of ordinary men and women. The reactionaries in business, and the bosses in politics, thus found these well-meaning and upright Judges instruments already fashioned for their use. Their purposes were served by gradually clothing the Judges with non-judicial functions, including especially the right to interpret and authoritatively and finally to declare the meaning of the supreme and fundamental law of the land, the Constitution. This made the Judges in reality irresponsible lawmakers, with a strong natural bias against every species of reform legislation for social and industrial relief and fair play.

"When by their decisions the Judges thus created a system of law hostile to popular interest the reactionaries defended them, and insisted that they be kept irresponsible, denouncing as an assault upon the independence of the Judges all effort to give to the people themselves the power to make their own laws for themselves—which necessarily means the power finally to interpret and to say what these laws really are.

"The conditions of modern life make it essential that men should work with concentrated capital. There must be big business in this era of world business, in this era of steam and electricity. Yet very great evils have come through permitting the uncontrolled concentration of big business in the hands of a few men, whose enormous wealth became formidable to the body politic because it waa in entirely irresponsible hands. The mock radicals, attempted to meet this situation by breaking up all big business units. This was attempted not merely as regards monopolies, but as regards every great corporation of such size as to get the maximum of efficiency.

"The effort has, of course, proved futile. If not futile it would prove mischievous. There is no use in trying to reverse the wheels of economic development. What is necessary is to recognize the fact that big business has come to stay, and so to control it and supervise it as to prevent there being any improper advantage taken by big business at the expense of small business. Moreover, we must insist upon the principle of co-operation, of profit sharing and partnership as regards employer and employe, so that the prosperity coming to the big business organization shall in measureable degree and with some approximation to justice be divided with the ordinary wage workers in the business.

"Probably in any such movement it is inevitable that the pioneers should at first meet defeat. We of the United States who are the pioneers in this movement shared the common lot. But we have nothing to regret, for in our case we have driven even our bitterest opponents to a frantic lip loyalty toward the very principles which they started by condemning.

"There was in the United States a historic party, the one to which I then belonged, which if true to its origin would have championed without exception every single one of the reforms which the Progressives have championed. Every single one of these reforms can find its justification in the principles and policies of Abraham Lincoln. We did not desire to go into any political or economic revolution; we do not believe in revolutions. But we most emphatically do believe that the only way to prevent violent revolution is to provide for peaceful growth and evolution in the right direction.

"We are not Socialists, for we do not believe in class consciousness, and we as little believe in mere doctrinaire dogmatism about collectivism as we believe in mere doctrinaire dogmatism about individualism. But we do believe that the only way to prevent the growth of a party founded on class consciousness is to secure the triumph in the community of a party founded on the ideal of social consciousness.

"Such a party must in good faith assume that each man is in very truth his brother's keeper. It must act in no spirit of vindictive hostility even toward wrongdoers. When necessary it must punish them. But where this can be avoided it must be avoided, and the end sought for obtained by changing the conditions which have brought about the wrongdoing.

"We believe in property rights as indispensable to the advancement of human rights, but where they are twisted into an obstacle to the advancement of human rights, then we are for human rights as against them. We believe in using the collective power of the people, through their government, not to hinder the growth of individualism or to interfere with individual activity, but so to regulate the possibilities of that growth as to give to the largest number of individuals possible the power to develop their own lives with the utmost freedom along their several lines, provided always that they do not wrongly interfere with the lives of their fellows."

PLEASED WITH CANAL WORK.

Congressional Committee Returning from Inspection Tour of Isthmus.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PANAMA, Nov. 22.—A large party of the Daughters of the Confederacy arrived here yesterday from New Orleans. They will remain a week, seeing the canal.

The Congressional Appropriation Committee, which has been here on its annual tour of inspection to obtain information as to requirements for the canal for the forthcoming year, sailed for New York to-day on the steamship Cristobal. Members of the committee expressed gratification at the progress made with the work. They had a long interview with Col. Goethals at Culebra yesterday. Some of them are in favor of expediting the arrangements for the permanent canal organization.

SOTHEBY'S TO MOVE WEST.

Famous London Book Mart Will Leave Strand for Bond Street.

LONDON, Nov. 10.—It is announced that Sotheby, Wilkinson & Hodge, the famous old book auction concern, will remove at the end of next year from Wellington Street, Strand, where it has been housed for nearly a hundred years, to Bond Street.

Sotheby's was founded in 1744, when Samuel Baker started to sell books in York Street, Covent Garden. In 1804, the house, under a new style, removed to 143 Strand, and fourteen years later it went to Wellington Street, the present title of the firm having been assumed in 1864.

Dr. Johnson used to walk into the rooms at Covent Garden, and the firm, as Leigh & Sotheby, sold the library of Addison in 1799, eighty years after the essayist's death.

One of the early dispersals in Covent Garden was that of the library of the notorious John Wilkes in 1764, after he was expelled from the House of Commons and proscribed for his "scandalous" "Essay on Woman." The daring publicist's books covered a wide field. Good editions of the classics abounded, and there were numerous works by Voltaire and other great French writers. Marriot's "Female Conduct; or, The Art of Pleasing," probably helped him in his condemned essay, and he was evidently a reader of poetry, including Churchill's and Lord Lansdowne's, names which sound serious to-day. He had also studied the Commissioners' reports inquiring into the estates of traitors, and that aid to electioneering, "The Voter's Guide; or, Candidate's Instructor," portions of which are not even yet out of date.

Since Wilkes's day many thousand tons of books have been dispersed at Sotheby's.

It is understood that the firm's new home will occupy the site of the present Doré Galleries. This is opposite the new quarters of the other famous house, that of Colnaghi. For many years this well-known art firm held a crown lease of premises opposite the National Gallery.

MRS. SYMONS ON STAGE.

Wife of Sick Poet Earns Money to Provide for His Needs.

LONDON, Nov. 10.—It only became known generally a few days ago that "Rhoda Symons," who plays the part of Serah in "Joseph and His Brethren" at His Majesty's Theatre, is Mrs. Arthur Symons, wife of the well-known poet and essayist. Mr. Symons some time ago suffered a complete breakdown of health, and is now lying seriously ill in a Surrey village. In order to insure provision for her husband Mrs. Symons decided to go on the stage, and, although she had no previous experience, by her charm and talent she has succeeded so well that her future stage career would seem to be assured.

Mrs. Symons made her first essays in theatrical work in Granville Barker's production of "A Winter's Tale" at the Savoy Theatre. She understudied the part of Paulina, but never played it in public. She made her first appearance at the Liverpool Repertory Theatre, where she took a character in "The Perplexed Husband."

When "Joseph and His Brethren" was produced at His Majesty's in September, Sir Herbert Tree engaged Mrs. Symons to play the difficult part of Serah, although she had never before appeared at a London theatre.

Mrs. Symons says in an interview in The Daily Mirror:

"Before my husband fell ill I devoted myself chiefly to looking after him and, if possible, helping him in his literary work. Since his illness—and I am afraid there is very little hope of him getting better—I realized that something had to be done, and decided I would take my chance as an actress.

"I am so grateful to everybody for being so nice to me. Sir Herbert Tree has been especially kind, and he engaged me for the part of Serah without any hesitation. I never expected to get a speaking part so soon, as I had no experience on the London stage—with the exception of understudying at the Savoy Theatre.

"I enjoy the work immensely. Some offers of engagements have been made to me after the run of 'Joseph and His Brethren.'"

A volume of poems and translations by Arthur Symons, entitled "The Knave of Hearts"—work done "before his breakdown—has just been published by Heinemann.

MILITANTS WRECKED CAUSE.

Lloyd George Tells Suffragists That Violence Has Been Fatal.

OXFORD, England, Nov. 22.—Chancellor of the Exchequer Lloyd George thinks it impossible now for the woman suffragists to obtain the passage of a bill granting the parliamentary franchise to women in the British Isles, as they have not a majority of the people behind them and have not captured any political machine. He gave this reply to three deputations, which waited on him here this morning and broached the question of woman suffrage.

Speakers for the deputation from the Oxford Men's Political Union told Mr. Lloyd George frankly that he, being in favor of votes for women, should wreck the Government if it did not grant the Parliamentary franchise to them.

Chancellor Lloyd George replied that he was ready to do anything within the limits of party loyalty to advance the cause of woman suffrage, but for the present he did not feel called upon to go beyond those limitations. Outside of the limits indicated the women had got on without him, Mr. Lloyd George added, and he thought several of his Cabinet ecileagues who held the same views as he did took up a similar standpoint.

Mr. Lloyd George reiterated that the militancy of some of the women had set public opinion in the British Isles against them and that there was no use in trying to pass a woman's suffrage bill against the wishes of the public.

In regard to the forcible feeding of women who declared a "hunger strike" while detained in prison for offenses against the law, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said the only alternative was to allow them to starve, and that was counseled by nobody.

ULTRA-VIOLET RAYS DEADLY

But Are Also Beneficent in Some of Their Effects, Prof. Berthelot Says.

PARIS, Nov. 22.—Prof. Daniel Berthelot, President of the International Society of Electricians, submitted this evening to the Society of Civil Engineers a report on his recent researches into the ultra-violet rays from mercury vapor lamps.

He characterized them as more dangerous than any other form of rays, declaring that they caused opthalmia, and ultimately blindness, burned the skin and produced effects similar to sunstroke.

In some of their effects, however, they were beneficent, as they killed many types of microbes by a few seconds' exposure and made drinking water absolutely sterile.

President Poincaré acted as Chairman of the meeting.

ENGLAND URGED TO ACT IN BOLIVIA

Charges of Atrocities in Rubber Districts Made Public by Anti-Slavery Society.

WORSE THAN AT PUTUMAYO

It Is Also Asserted That Cruelties in Peru Continue Unchecked Despite the Recent Investigation.

By Marconi Transatlantic Wireless Telegraph to The New York Times.

LONDON, Nov. 22.—Travers Buxton, Secretary of the Anti-Slavery and Aborigines Protection Society, forwarded for THE NEW YORK TIMES to-day the copy of an important communication relative to the alleged atrocities in Bolivia, which, as stated in these dispatches, has been placed by the society before the British Foreign Office. The document is released for publication in the British press on Monday.

The society's letter, which is addressed to the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, is dated Oct. 13 and brings formally to the notice of the British Government "conditions in certain areas of South America, which are as bad, or even worse, than in Putumayo."

The society's informant, who is an Englishman of considerable experience, not unknown at the Foreign Office, holds himself at the disposal of the Government to substantiate his allegations.

The document asserts that the peonage system, as now operated in Beni, Acre, and other districts of the Upper Amazon, is more cruel and destructive to human life than the old system of slave-owning and slave-trading, the abolition of which the society labored so long to obtain.

The society's informant particularly emphasizes the inhuman flogging of women, the murders of India-rubber workers, and the frequent suicides of despairing white agents.

"The gravity of these allegations," continues the document, "will not, we are sure, escape the attention of his Majesty's Government, and we beg to suggest that in view of the British treaty and responsibilities and still more of the fact that British subjects and British capital appear to be deeply involved, steps be at once taken to secure a thorough investigation by an official of his Majesty's Government."

It is also asserted in the society's communication that atrocities continue in the Putumayo district and that Victor Macedo, Antonio Menacho, and Fidel Velarde, who were classed by Sir Roger Casement as among "the worst criminals in Putumayo," openly pursue their nefarious work unmolested either by the Peruvian, Bolivian, or Brazilian authorities. It is added that the activity of Macedo is made possible by the financial aid of Julio Caesar Arana.

Augusto Jimenez and Abelardo Aguerro, who, according to Sir Roger Casement, committed appalling and innumerable crimes upon the Boras Indians, are still exploiting the Indians in the River Orton district, under the name of Cavero & Co., being enabled to do so through the financial assistance of Francisco Suarez.

It is noted that Cecil Gosling, the British Minister to Bolivia, recently visited Suarez, but, say the letter to the Foreign Office, 'in all probability, many of the crimes alleged to have been committed in the Suarez concession were carefully kept from his knowledge."

In conclusion, the letter gave the Foreign Office notice that the charges would be made public in a month's time, "which will provide ample time for the Governments concerned to arrest the criminal agents whose whereabouts has for months been well known to officials of the Peruvian, Brazilian, and Bolivian Governments."

Milliners Suggest It May Have Serious Effects on Automobile Construction.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, Nov. 22.—The latest freak in fashions, "the skyscraper hat," has reached London, although not yet seen in public. THE NEW YORK TIMES correspondent was privileged to have a private view of this amazing creation in the ateller of a French milliner who is introducing it.

It is justly named "the skyscraper," for it towered 28 inches from base to tip of plume. Imagine a turban of black taffeta ribbon, built up in tiers à la pagoda and surmounted by a swishing black aigrette like a flag on the top of a building. The model who wore the skyscraper said that the two feet and a third of headgear felt not at all uncomfortable.

The creator of the hat said to THE NEW YORK TIMES correspondent:

"Will the skyscraper catch on this Winter and become a popular style? That is what we all want to know. We are all up in the air, wondering which way the cat is going to jump. We have had hats of practically every conceivable size and shape—long, broad, mushroom, and inverted peach basket, but never a tall hat.

"Of course, this model is only a chrysalis out of which something is going to come—we do not know what. But while it is too early to prophesy definitely I see no evidence of the large picture hat coming back at the present moment, and believe that the tendency is going to be all toward height.

"If so, it is going to bring out some mighty curious consequences in its train. For one thing, a woman wearing a skyscraper will not be able to sit up straight in a taxicab or a limousine, as they are built with low roofs at present. Either the bodybuilders will have to build cars with hatboxes in their tops, or women will have to lean forward constantly.

"One would think that with the taxis and limousines getting lower, hats would logically be made lower, too. Even to-day a woman of fashion cannot ride comfortably in a limousine for fear of crushing her aigrette. The future is going to be infinitely worse.

"Another interesting consequence of the continual leaning forward is likely still further to change the fashionable figure along the present lines, which are all away from an erect figure with shoulders back and tending toward a loose-limbed slouch with shoulders forward and the stomach out of balance."

FIRE SWEEPS QUEBEC TOWN

150 Horses Destroyed at Ste. Marie Loss Is $300,000.

LEVIS, Quebec, Nov. 22.—Ste. Marie, a town of 1,600 inhabitants, was swept by fire to-day. One hundred and fifty houses had been destroyed and the fire was still raging unchecked at 10 o'clock when a call for aid was received here. Every piece of fire-fighting apparatus that could be spared was dispatched at once on a special train.

According to reports received here the damage wrought by the fire was $300,000.

Under normal conditions a certain portion of each telephone switchboard is held in reserve. When sudden and heavy demands for service arise, however, the vacant "positions," as they are called, are at once filled by reserve operators so that calls can be handled on a "no-delay" basis, without interruption of service or inconvenience to subscribers.

Prompt Telephone Service —Under All Conditions

TO INSURE rapid telephone communication in New York City at all times, we must be prepared to handle the fluctuating volume of traffic that is created by varying conditions. We must be prepared for the unexpected as well as for the usual.

Each day we have our busy hours and our slack hours. For instance, in one of our exchanges we handle nearly 17,000 calls between 10.00 A.M. and 11.00 A.M. In the same exchange we handle 5,000 calls between 5.00 P.M. and 6.00 P.M. To meet these expected fluctuations is part of our daily work.

But we must be prepared also to meet unusual conditions and emergencies. Unexpected storms, large fires or accidents, extremely hot or cold days, make sudden and heavy demands upon the system. Yet, in such cases, so efficiently is the service rendered, that there is practically no delay. The service is so prompt under all conditions, that the subscriber never realizes how heavy may be the demands upon the service.

On the day before last Christmas a very heavy snowstorm came most unexpectedly. Telephone calls in the city increased 50%, or from 2,000,000 to 3,000,000 in one day, yet we furnished service practically without delay, and made it possible for telephone users all over the city to avoid personal trips through sleet and snow in carrying on their social and business affairs.

By arranging our operating loads, by keeping reserve apparatus in readiness and a reserve force within call, we meet all emergencies promptly and efficiently. It is all in our plan of giving to New York City

"The Best Telephone Service in the World."

INACCESSIBLE MONEY.

Will it be believed that one of those farmers' organizations which the Administration is forbidden to prosecute with money voted by Congress has been unable to get accommodation from the funds of the Treasury? The fact is vouched for by an officer of the Agricultural Department, who saw the loan refused. It was asked by a cotton growers' organization in Arkansas, which wanted it on the security of crops, and the unsympathetic banking official of Little Rock said he had already loaned three millions to buyers and commission men.

The President added that he was one of the committee handling the Arkansas allotment of Government funds distributed for crop moving, and that so far as he knew no farmer was able to avail himself directly of the use of any part of the fund.

It seems that the people who were buying the crops could get accommodation, but there were no funds for those who wanted to hold the crops? This is as it ought to be, although not as the Treasury planned to have it. That there was no lack of funds to "move" the crops appears from the fact that the Treasury's allotment was not all applied for, and while the funds were on offer they did not reach the farmers about whom the Treasury was so anxious.

The incident is instructive in connection with the pending banking and currency reform bill. It is not pretended that it is constructed upon banking principles. It is motived by the Democratic platform, and by the benevolence of those who want to divert funds from Wall Street speculation to the uses of planters who want to carry their crops until the prices suit them. There is not the least objection to anybody carrying anything he owns as long as he wants to, provided he does it with his own funds, or with the assistance of banking funds secured at his own cost and risk. But it ought not to be done with the Treasury funds. Similarly, banking legislation designed for the good of the entire country ought to do the best that can be done, and not be deformed into a measure for the benefit or the punishment of any class.

Such an attempt will not be successful any more than the Treasury's attempt. The money so carefully diverted from Wall Street drifted into Wall Street as fast as credits could travel, and even before it reached Wall Street it could not be got by the farmers. Any attempt to distinguish between bad speculators in produce and bad speculators in securities will fail. They are birds of one feather, and equally ill-deserving. The danger is that the attempt to give them their deserts will react against speculators who serve a legitimate purpose. The country cannot afford to lose those speculators in commodities who provide abundance against scarcity and those speculators in securities who construct railways and industrial works. The good and the bad of both sorts are to be found in Wall Street, and the punishment of Wall Street will fall alike on the just and the unjust.

The remedying of abuses of this sort is not the fair function of a banking bill, but it is the undisguised objective of those who are guiding legislation contrary to the science which is sure even if not exact.

THE GREAT LAKES DISASTER.

The cable reports that Lloyd's, London, lost $7,500,000 in the recent storm on the Great Lakes. That loss equals the value of the Titanic. Twice as many lives were lost as with the Volturno. The incident ought to impress the lesson that the dangers of the lakes rival those of the ocean. It has become the custom to take liberties with the lakes because harbors are near, and voyages are relatively short. Cargoes are not carefully stowed, and the result is that ships sink or turn over because cargoes shift.

If harbors are near so are dangerous shores, and lake-built craft cannot run before the storm as in the ocean. Craft of ten-knot speed cannot face a faster gale, and drift sternward with full steam ahead. Lake models are too long and low in proportion to their depth to be seaworthy. If they get into a seaway they roll until their cargo wets and trim is lost. The construction is good for ordinary conditions, but it lacks sufficient factors of safety for storms or for craft laden with ice, as lake craft often are in the season.

The lesson is for greater engine power, for holds so divided that cargoes cannot alter their position and throw craft on their beam ends, for models designed for safety as well as for cargo capacity, and for enforcement of these standards in any suitable manner.

A COMMENDABLE OMISSION.

In suppressing the long customary New Year's reception at the White House, President WILSON has dealt a severer blow to tradition than he did in omitting the Inauguration Ball. Yet, whatever of complaint may be heard in Washington, there is little doubt that his course in such matters will be approved by the sober sense of the country. New Year's receptions were abolished as social functions many years ago, but the custom has been clung to at the White House as patiently as if it were a part of the unwritten law of this land that its Chief Magistrate should keep open house the first day of the year and keep his family at home to help him receive the multitude.

The President was elected on a platform of innovation, and it was to be expected that he would cling to no custom simply because it is old. The theory that the President is the servant of the people is admitted, but his servitude is severer than it used to be, he has more business to transact every year, and he is right in refusing to waste his time and energy.

FRISCO DIRECTORS' PROFITS.

We suspect that in the accounts which have come from St. Louis of the investigation which the Interstate Commerce Commission is making into the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad receivership discounts on securities sold have been confused with commissions alleged to have been paid to bankers and brokers, but the facts regarding the profits which certain officers and Directors of the company made in dealing with their own concern seem to be clouded by no such confusion of figures. The profits are apparently admitted by at least some of those who made them. Possibly restitution has been or may be made, but as the record stands certain Directors of this railroad which has now come upon evil days in effect voted themselves large personal profits out of the treasury of the company whose management was intrusted to them by the stockholders. These facts brought out in the testimony, so long as they stand undisputed, if indeed they can be disputed, carry their own condemnation.

It may be said that if the managers of the road or some of them had not interested themselves in the building of these feeder lines they would never have been built at all. The point might be made that the company would have been better off without some of these feeders, but that would be altogether apart from the main question. Perhaps the Directors personally interested in these sales did not vote at the board meetings which ratified the purchases, but even in that event their influence must have been felt unless the Directors, apart from those who made these profits, were less exposed than most to human frailties. The only safe course is for Directors not to seek any personal profit whatever in trading with their own company. In no other way can they avoid the suspicion of wrong even if they succeed in avoiding wrong itself. It is incumbent upon them to avoid both.

It would be easy in the early days of railroad financing in this country to find many parallels for the sort of transaction which the Commerce Commission inquiry in the affairs of the Frisco system has brought into clear relief, but will any one care to fall back on precedents which for so long brought disrepute upon our railroad securities abroad and at home? The management of the Frisco system, so far as it was involved in the transactions which are now under censure, has done a visible and great injury to all the railroad interests of the country. Nobody but a reckless enemy of all corporations would say that the acts disclosed in this case are typical of railroad management generally. But that is the very point. The railroad corporations have enemies, and some of them are reckless. Many politicians thrive or hope to thrive by assailing the railroads, hoping in that way to win popular applause and following. The Directors and officers of this one railroad corporation by their dealings now laid bare, in which they stood upon both sides of the transaction, have played directly into the hands of the demagogic assailants of corporations. They have added very largely to their stock in trade, and at a time when, as every reasonable man knows, railroad managers as a whole are most desirous of winning and holding the confidence of the people by the integrity of their acts and by faithful compliance with law.

The disclosure of these censurable transactions comes, too, at a moment when the railroads of the Eastern territory are called upon to defend before the Interstate Commerce Commission their proposed increase in freight rates. To say that the revelations are untimely and unfortunate does not meet the needs of the case. There should have been no revelations, because there ought to have been no transgressions of this nature. The farmers of the West and of the South, too, have been told that they should cooperate with the railroads, that they should give them their confidence, and should stay the hands of their political assailants. But how can the farmers be expected to give their confidence to the railroads in the face of this evidence that a railroad system has been exploited for private gain? The effect upon investors, especially foreign investors, to whom the railroad corporations must for years make large appeals in the effort to market their securities, will of course be most damaging. It is not only from the public, not alone from the official representatives of the public, but from the chief men of the honestly managed railroads that the sternest censure of these practices should come.

MEXICO AND ENGLAND.

There has been no disposition here to misjudge the British attitude toward our relations with Mexico. Sir LIONEL CARDEN'S obvious indiscretion has been looked upon as a personal fault and not charged against his fellow-countrymen. We have accepted, in the spirit in which they were tendered, British assurances of sympathy with our point of view. But though there was no uncertain tone in the Premier's manly and frank speech at the Guildhall banquet the other day, we can scarcely fail to note the determination of some Englishmen to misjudge the American attitude. The article in The Outlook of London, cabled in part to the American press yesterday, was obviously as malicious as that of the Paris Temps was ill-informed. The French writer misunderstands the situation, but it is not at all likely that any English journalist can really believe that the American people are contemplating a war of conquest in Mexico or that the policy of President WILSON in dealing with our afflicted sister republic has been or ever will be influenced by "money-grubbers."

A certain small but not uninfluential contingent in Great Britain has always affected to misunderstand our intentions toward Cuba, though the absolute honesty of purpose we have shown in regard to that little country which we rescued from tyranny and placed on a self-governing basis has been obvious. Many of the English have wanted us to take Cuba as a sort of justification for England's own aggression in various parts of the world. Some of them now are anxious to get Americans angry about Mexico, they do not seem to care in what way, if they can only precipitate war. In spite of their efforts, however, we are not going to lose our temper, and we are not going to charge their malice against the British Government or the mass of the English people. In regard to Mexico President WILSON will proceed in his own way, choosing his own time, and his policy will have the support of the whole country.

NATHAN STRAUS'S SERVICES.

Gifted with singular insight in the processes of business, able to foresee changes in customs and to supply the new wants of people with the intent of improving their conditions of daily living, Mr. NATHAN STRAUS has announced his purpose to transfer his energies wholly from the business which he has carried on with such ability and success into the field of philanthropic endeavor. The same foresight used in building up a great mercantile establishment will be employed henceforth in devising means to prevent human suffering.

Mr. STRAUS has already placed multitudes in his debt, especially among the poor and of the younger generation, in guarding them against tuberculosis and other infectious diseases. His propaganda for the destruction of dangerous germs in milk has resulted in the pasteurization of a large part of this city's supply. His campaign, which is justified by the fact that no other way exists for safeguarding the product of 30,000 dairies scattered through many States and jurisdictions, will be prosecuted with new vigor. In this and in kindred activities the city, which has witnessed the growth of his enterprise, is to be congratulated for having the services of a mind so original and solicitous of its welfare.

THE SPEEDING MAIL TRUCKS.

Does the control of post roads lodged in the Federal Government permit Mr. JOSEPH STEWART, Second Assistant Postmaster General, to authorize the speeding of postal motor car trucks through this city's streets without regard to the rules for safeguarding human life? Such is the doctrine which that self-complacent official preached at the Aldermen's hearing on Friday. The trucks may rush across the tides of traffic, run down men, women, and children, and this city may not restrain their drivers. Meeting the trains according to the present schedule is of greater consequence, Mr. STEWART seems to believe, than any mere question of life and death.

Let the city test this extraordinary assumption in the courts. The death rate for the mail trucks, according to Mr. STEWART, is 1 in every 768 miles. Col. COANELL of the National Highways Protective Society says that but one person was killed last year by the Fifth Avenue Coach Company, running its stages over 2,000,000 miles, and but three persons were killed in 1912 by 1,400 vehicles belonging to the four big taxicab companies, with an aggregate run of nearly 19,000,000 miles. The mail trucks have killed seven persons within three months past and injured several more. If the Aldermen will rescind at once the exemption from the traffic rules of mail wagons we think the police, the Magistrates, and the Judges will be in a position to teach Mr. STEWART a lesson in constitutional law.

THE CITY CLUB.

The annual report of the President of the City Club, Mr. CHARLES H. STRONG, shows the club to be steadily increasing its activity and its usefulness. The purpose of the club is defined accurately by its constitution:

> The purpose of The City Club of New York shall be to aid in securing permanent good government for the City of New York through the election and the appointment of honest and able municipal officers and the establishment of a clear and stable system of laws relating to the city. The club declares its belief that the government of this city must be separated at all points from national party politics. The club will not take any part in State or national politics, except so far as the interests of the City of New York may be involved in the election of the two branches of the State Legislature, and the passage of State laws.

In a sense the club performs the functions of a vigilance committee in continuous session, for through its special committees it keeps a watchful eye on what concerns the city in the legislation at Albany and in the offices of the City Government. It is significant, for example, that during the past year the club opposed 147 bills in the Legislature; 49 were passed, but 35 of these were vetoed either by the Mayor or by the Governor, and only 14 were enacted into law. As our readers are aware, we have not always been able to agree with the club as to its recommendations in city affairs, but we have had no doubt as to the excellence of the motives of the active officers of the association, the industry and fidelity they have brought to their work, or the substantial service they have rendered to the city. Besides the immediate work of the club, it has rendered good service as a sort of clearing house for the discussion and promotion of plans for public advantage.

THE YEAR OF BOOKS.

The list of the best 100 books of the year 1913, which will form one of the noteworthy features of the Holiday Number of THE NEW YORK TIMES BOOK REVIEW, to be published next Sunday, has been selected with great care and a keen sense of responsibility by Prof. JOHN ERSKINE and two of his associates in the Department of English of Columbia University, Dr. H. R. STEEVES and Dr. CARL VAN DOREN. To pick out from many books an even hundred fit to be called "the best" was of course a task beset with difficulties. Doubtless some persons will look through the list for a book or two which will not be there. Dr. CHARLES B. DAVENPORT, for instance, the principal American authority on the science of eugenics, in choosing a book to serve as his text in writing for the same special number an article on his own subject, has hit upon Dr. FREDERICK ADAMS WOODS'S "The Influence of Monarchs," which was treated as a work of uncommon interest by our reviewers when it was published, but is not included in the list of 100. We are confident, however, that the general opinion of people who know much about books will be that the selection of Prof. ERSKINE and his associates is normal. It comprehends the books of the year in the various branches of literature making the largest appeal, and, with Prof. ERSKINE'S illuminative introduction, and explanatory articles on all the books contributed by experienced reviewers, will constitute a feature of positively unique value.

Dr. DAVENPORT'S contribution, already mentioned, is one of four articles by expert writers, whose authority is unquestioned, dealing with the year's books on four subjects of vital interest. Miss ELLEN GLASGOW, the distinguished novelist, takes up the subject of feminism; ALGERNON LEE, President of the Rand School of Social Science, that of socialism, while HENRY MILLS ALDEN, editor of Harper's Magazine and author of "God in His World" and "A Study of Death," will review a book of the year treating of the possibility of the survival of the human consciousness. These will be only the most striking and noteworthy features of a special number of THE NEW YORK TIMES BOOK REVIEW surpassing in all its contents any hitherto published, which is saying a great deal.

NOTES AND GLEANINGS.

Recent researches on the freezing points of the sap of plants made by experimenters in Trinity College, Dublin, may result in better extracts of herbs and plant organs in pharmacy and the arts. To press sap from the living untreated organ, even when the cells of the tissues are completely crushed, does not result in so concentrated a solution as when the tissues are made permeable by chloroform, heat, or liquid air. In the current Notes from the Botanical School of Trinity College several studies of osmotic pressures in plants may furnish practical suggestions to brewers and makers of drugs.

When the trainer of a track team wishes to calculate the improvement which each of his men has made, he compares their physical measurements and records of speed and endurance at the beginning and close of each stage of training. In The Psychological Clinic for November, Mr. WILLIAM E. GRADY of this city urges the adoption of similar standards for mind-trainers in the schools. The set examinations will not do. They do not test the ease, alertness and rapid action of the mind. Its separate processes should be timed, and its ability to co-ordinate in due form while engaged in intellectual sprinting should be observed and recorded.

Soap is being used more and more. The American Perfumer prints advance statistics gathered in the United States census of 1909, showing a great increase in all departments of the soap industry, especially in number of workers and in amount of capital involved. The wage-earners increased by more than one-fifth in five years, and in the 420 establishments reported the average value of products for each increased from $156,593 in 1904 to $265,138 in 1909. New York State leads in this industry.

Since the Triangle and Binghamton factory fires not much has been done to protect the operatives in the 45,000 factories of this State known to be deficient in real safeguards against fire. The American Underwriter contains a letter from its editor, EDWARD BUNNELL PHELPS, addressed to the New York Industrial Board and urging that it require the installation of automatic sprinklers in these establishments. There is no record of loss of life anywhere in factories thus protected.

No marksman ever holds a rifle "as solidly as a rock." He may think he does, but Arms and the Man insists that the best shot gives merely the "necessary impulse to the trigger while the rifle is moving in the right direction"—that is, when he takes deliberate aim. The snap-shooter works apparently by a sort of instinct. Firing successfully at a running deer through woods and over broken ground implies a knack like that of thrusting one's finger toward an indicated object.

PUNISHING THRIFT.

E. E. Rittenhouse Condemns Tax on Policy Holders.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Your editorial article recently on the tax on the thrifty and benevolent is both timely and illuminating. The injustice of levying such heavy burdens of taxation upon policy holders as a class should be obvious to every lawmaker. For instance, over one-third of the States in the Union have provided pensions or other forms of relief from the public funds for needy widowed mothers. As the protection of widows and orphans is the primary purpose of life insurance, we commend the sense of humanity and justice which prompted the lawmakers to adopt this course. But if it is wise for the States to protect widows and orphans, why do these same States penalize the provident heads of families by requiring them to pay a tax on their life insurance premiums?

In effect, these lawmakers say to the thrifty, unselfish, and devoted husband: "If you insure your life to protect your wife and children after your death, we will fine you with a penalizing tax for doing it." To the improvident, spendthrift husband these States say in effect: "Never mind; if you leave your wife and children penniless and without insurance protection we will give them a pension from the public funds."

Thus, the States, by taxing life insurance, are in a sense taking the money provided by the insured to care for their families and using it for pensions for the families of the improvident. These needy families must not be neglected, but if the State must have this money, why not tax the men who are not insured instead of penalizing those who are insured?

There is a time when almost every man can be insured. Why should any part of the penalty of his neglect be charged to the man who does insure?

E. E. RITTENHOUSE,
Conservation Commissioner, the Equitable Life Assurance Society.

A MISLEADING PLAY.

An Assistant District Attorney Says It Does His Office an Injustice.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

The play "The Man Inside" deserves the attention of the public. It says to its audiences, in effect, that the District Attorney's office is one where no heart, no conscience, no justice exists. It teaches that the functions of that great office are prostituted for the sake of securing convictions, irrespective of whether the defendant is guilty or innocent of the crime charged.

It depicts the far-reaching power of the office as used to frighten interested witnesses for the defense to "squeal" on their kith and kin by subjecting them to such depths of degradation and shame that reason is lost and injustice triumphs. Is there a place in this great country where an intelligent person can believe that a woman is searched for stolen "evidence" of crime, in the fashion depicted in the play, "with no matron present"?

No wonder people cry for the "recall of Judges," "judicial decisions," and what not! Such plays threaten the foundations of civilized society. They breed contempt of the law, its officers, sworn to do their duty, the whole administration of justice.

SAMUEL HERSHENSTEIN,
U. S. Assistant District Attorney.
New York, Nov. 21, 1913.

Judge Lindsey Defended.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Senator Helen Ring Robinson of Colorado takes no stock in the accusations against Judge Lindsey. After her lecture in Boston the other night she answered questions from the audience. One was about Judge Lindsey. Senator Robinson said that she had investigated the list of complaints made against him by his enemies, and found that they had seriously garbled the facts. Some good people, she says, do not approve of his probation system, but she herself does; and she declared that Judge Lindsey was "one of the greatest forces for good in Colorado."

As Senator Robinson does not belong to the same political party as Judge Lindsey, her testimony in his behalf carries the more weight. ALICE STONE BLACKWELL.
Dorchester, Mass., Nov. 21, 1913.

Times Book Review for Schools.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

It may interest you to know that I use THE NEW YORK TIMES BOOK REVIEW supplement in several of my classes. It seems to me to be very satisfactory as a basis for exercises in oral English, and to give pupils information in regard to the best current literature which they could not, or would not, obtain in any other way. I believe that it adds one more to the list of periodicals which are helpful in classes studying modern magazines. EMMA F. LOWD,
Chairman of the English Department of the Washington Irving High School.

Good English and "Slang."

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Referring to the lament of "H. S." on "the growing use of slang," as evidenced by the perversion, so to speak, of good English, it strikes me as mainly a matter of inference, thus:

> I made to kiss my love
> Good-night.
> Instead, I got a shove—
> Good-night!

LUTHER'S LIFE PURE.

Dr. Remensnyder Cites the Testimony of Contemporaries.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Perhaps the surprising attack of Mgr. McMahon upon Luther, printed in a late issue of THE TIMES, charging that he was "deliberately and consciously immoral" should not go unanswered. So conscientious was Luther that, a young student, he renounced all and entered a monastery. There he afflicted himself with the severest austerities, says his biographer.

> These severe penances for supposed sins in searching his life and thoughts were not for, as might have been imagined with a strong young man like himself, a question of any sensual appetites. But it was only for spiritual temptations, such as doubt, and anger and envy against his fellow-brethren that he had to reproach himself.

At a later period, at the height of Luther's influence, he issued his famous "Address to the German Nobility," in which, among other immoralities, he emphasizes the need of reform as to what we now call "the social evil." He specifies "houses of ill-fame." "Preaching," he says, "has no longer any effect upon these evils; the secular power must interfere to check them." They cannot, he thinks, be abolished, "but it will bring a Christian country to the immoral level of heathenism if no governmental means can be found to restrict them." Can we for a moment entertain the thought that the author of such an appeal was so execrable a hypocrite that he was all the time leading a life himself "deliberately and consciously immoral"?

It is one's personal friends who know most truly his real character. Mathesius, who was converted by Luther's writings, and who later became a great theologian, lived for several years in Luther's home. He tells us "that there was nothing secretly impure about him. His friends and guests spoke of the 'chaste lips' of Luther. He was a foe to unchastity and loose talk. As long as I have been with him," concludes Mathesius, "I have never heard an unchaste word fall from his lips."

Luther was not only "one of the greatest personalities and most fascinating individualities of the human race, with a mind so masterful as to dominate those about him, and to impress its stamp upon the subsequent political and religious history of the world," as Mgr. McMahon describes him. He was preeminently a great religious character, who lived in the Scriptures, and whose spirit communed with the deep things of eternity, and who dwelt under the shadow of the Almighty, and who lived with Christ and the cross—therein lay the secret of his incalculable, age-long, and ever-growing power upon religion, history, and civilization. Such a world-wide, revered character needs no defense.

In conclusion, I wish to express my surprise that in this age of modern enlightenment, before an intelligent audience right here in the City of New York, such an inexcusable libel upon the illustrious founder of Protestantism would be uttered, or tolerated by the hearers.

NEW BOARD OF EDUCATION.

Commissioner Stern Urged for Reappointment by Mayor.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

As your valued publication has given the benefit of its columns to the expression of views as to the advisability of the Mayor's reappointment of Mr. Churchill, now President of the Board of Education, I wish to warn that the question of other members who come up for reappointment should not be disposed of summarily.

It is in my opinion of the greatest importance that Commissioner Stern should be reappointed. He is one of the few members of the board closely acquainted with the details of the schools and is most unselfishly interested in educational problems of the children. I have known the work done by Commissioner Stern most intimately for a number of years as his colleague, and had frequent opportunities to admire Mr. Stern for his absolutely unselfish devotion to the interests of our school children.

At all times he had to stand a good many attacks on account of his opposition to City Superintendent Maxwell and it is extraordinary that he should now be persona non grata, especially on account of his having taken the side of Superintendent Maxwell too frequently. I would consider it a great loss if a man whose work has really the right to be considered that of an authority should be lost to his colleagues on the Board and to the city at large.

A GIFT TO FRANCE.

First Vessel to Cross Canal Should Be Presented to Her.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

In the foreign columns of THE TIMES appears a dispatch quoting the remarks of the Figaro on the passage of the first vessel through the entire length of the Panama Canal. This vessel appears to be a French-built one, and came into the hands of the United States through the transfer to it of the French rights in the Canal Zone.

The Figaro advises that the French people take steps to purchase this vessel as a relic of French engineering effort at Panama.

Coming from so representative a source as the Figaro, there can hardly be a doubt that the French people do place a historical value on this vessel, and, such being the case, it seems to me that it would be a graceful act on the part of the people of the United States to present this vessel to France. The name of France and one of her greatest engineers will forever be intimately connected with the great work that has been done at Panama, and an act of courtesy such as above suggested would seem to be but proper acknowledgment of French effort in the Panama Canal problem. Extent of Child Labor.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Much good gray matter has been troubled and distressed over the sad fate of 2,000,000 children under 16 years of age alleged to be at work at gainful and often painful occupations in this country. But the census figures do not substantiate these dismal statistics so sweet to the tongues of Socialist orators and uplifters. There are but 1,750,000 instead of 2,000,000; the vast majority of these are 14 and 15 years old, and should in fact be working.

The proportion in mines and factories and what may, perhaps, be called unsuitable work is given in the census figures for 1910 as 8,151 under 16 years of age in mines, which is less than three-quarters of 1 per cent. of all so employed. Moreover, five-eighths of the 8,000 work over ground.

The persons under 16 years employed in factories numbered 161,000 by the census, about 2½ per cent of the total of persons so employed.

Children, of course, should not be put to work at too tender an age, but just why any one should want to keep the children unemployed after 14 years of age is very strange. When will they learn to work if not when they are young? Keeping them at school all day is very little use.

ATYPICAL CHILDREN.

Dr. MacDonald Urges the Better Funding of Clearing House.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

The clearing house for mental defectives was established about a year ago by Commissioner Drummond at the suggestion, and with the active co-operation, of Dr. Max G. Schlapp as an accessory of the Department of Public Charities, for the purpose of determining the final disposition of mental defectives and endeavoring to solve the problem of the classification, segregation, and proper care of that constantly increasing class of our population known as the feeble-minded or mental defectives, a purpose the importance of which could scarcely be overestimated.

Unfortunately the efforts of these officials, both at the clearing house and at the Randall's Island Hospital for Atypical Children, of which the clearing house is a feeder, have been seriously handicapped for want of necessary means to prosecute the work. Thus far the cost of carrying on the work of the clearing house and the payment of salaries of the resident medical staff of the Randall's Island institution have been met by private contributions, Commissioner Drummond having no appropriation which could be legitimately used for that purpose. Dr. Schlapp, the Director of the clearing house, and his associate psychiatrists in daily attendance there, have served thus far without pecuniary compensation, while the medical staff—three in number—at the branch of the Randall's Island Hospital, which is devoted to the care of the feeble-minded, receive only meagre salaries out of the private fund referred to. This, which at best can only be regarded as a temporary arrangement, is not as it should be. The city should at once provide for reasonable compensation for the attending specialists, their lay assistants, and for other necessary expenses of the clearing house, as well as for the salaries of the medical staff at the hospital. It is to be hoped that the modest appropriation which Commissioner Drummond has asked for to carry on this important work will be speedily granted by the Board of Estimate and Apportionment, as otherwise the work so well begun will have to be discontinued in the near future.

One needs to spend but a few hours at the clearing house to realize the importance and value of the work which Dr. Schlapp and his associate workers, both lay and professional, are doing—a work founded on the broad basis of humanity and scientific philanthropy, and conducted in a true spirit of altruism.

The clearing house, as I have observed it, is a veritable hive of scientific industry. Patients are referred to it from the schools, from the children's courts, from various charitable and philanthropic societies, &c., and many of them are brought by their relatives or friends. At present there are 147 charitable and other institutions, exclusive of the children's court, hospitals, and public schools, that send patients to the clearing house for examination and report. These patients are subjected to most careful scientific mental and physical tests. The mental or psychological tests—that is, the tests to determine the patient's mental or intelligence age as compared with his actual age—are made by the Binet method. This method enables the examiner to determine with reasonable certainty the mental status of the subject—that is, the degree of his mental development—and to classify him accordingly. At the same time, the family history is inquired into with reference to the existence in the ancestry of a neuropathic or psychopathic taint, such as insanity, epilepsy, feeble-mindedness, alcoholism, criminality, moral obliquity, or other prenatal influences. Inquiry is also made in respect to the personal history of the patient from infancy to the present time, especially with reference to mental peculiarities, schooling, occupations, environment, &c., all of which is carefully recorded. These patients are also examined with reference to the existence of physical disorders or defects of a medical or surgical nature, the removal of which might effect an arrest of the mental retardation which is sometimes mistaken for psychopathic mental defect. Subsequently, these patients are seen at their homes, if they have any, by intelligent visiting nurses, and if it is found that they cannot be properly cared for at home, as is frequently the case, they are sent to Randall's Island or to State institutions for that class.

The Federal Game Law.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

In the 1913 issue of the New York State Conservation Law our commission printed the Federal act absolutely without comment, and in an obscure part of the volume, although it is, without question, the most important game legislation that ever has been passed in this country since the Federal act known as the Lacey act.

The New Jersey Commissioners, on the contrary, print the Federal migratory bird law in the very beginning of their volume for 1913, and lead it with a prominent article headed, "Warning to Gunners."

If the New York State Conservation Commissioners felt that it was their duty to assert and maintain the sovereignty of New York State, (a matter for which they cannot be censured,) they could easily have announced in the 1913 edition of the laws that the State denied the constitutionality of the Federal act, and reserved the right to test it, but that, in the meantime, the commission warned all sportsmen to obey the regulations in that act. The Commissioners had full legal power to do this under the conservation law, which gives them the right to alter seasons and grant additional protection to any fish or game. Why did they not adopt this simple and proper course? They can do it yet. JULIUS MULLER.

MEXICO.

Distraught, disheveled, weeping Mexico,
Thrust hate from out thy heart and nobly rise.
Sweet love and peace again within thine eyes,
Thy soul absolved of internecine woe;
Dusk daughter of the Gulf, thy footsteps go
In ways seditious where the darkness lies
Shutting the heavens from the tropic skies,
Blighting the noonday with a sullen glow;
Heed the wise purpose of thy neighbor sphere,
'Tis but to bind thy wound and dry thy tear;
No intervention yet—or ever—'til
The need be sore indeed, we pause, and then
We pause, e'er either host of maddened men
Be given arms speedier to maim and kill.

KLINE GREETS BOOTH AT THE CITY HALL

Mayor Welcomes Head of Salvation Army and Praises Work of His Father.

ARMY MEMBERS PARADE

All Branches of the Organization Represented in Ranks of Those Who March to Mayor's Office.

Gen. Bramwell Booth, Commander in Chief of the Salvation Army, was welcomed to this city yesterday by Mayor Ardolph L. Kline in the presence of nearly 5,000 persons at the City Hall. Of those who attended the ceremonies 2,500 were members of the army in uniform, representing thirty States Preceding the formal reception there was a parade through the streets of downtown New York. Gen. Booth and his sister, Commander Evangeline Booth, were driven to the edge of City Hall Park in an auto. As they walked toward the steps of the building ten bands, which had participated in the parade, flared forth a greeting and the crowd cheered. Every marcher in the parade—men and women alike—carried American flags.

The gray-haired General and his sister, the children of the late Gen. William Booth, founder of the organization, walked slowly up the steps and into the City Hall, while their followers gave round after round of applause. They were escorted into the Mayor's reception room, and a few minutes later the Mayor entered. He shook hands with Miss Booth and the General, and the latter, addressing the Mayor, said:

"I am very pleased to meet you. This is my first visit to New York, and I am delighted to find how many friends I have."

"Yes," replied the Mayor, "we must go abroad to find out what the world thinks of us. You say this is your first visit; I trust it will not be your last."

Outside the crowd broke into impatient cheers, and the Mayor, Gen. Booth, and Miss Booth hurried to the steps of the City Hall, where they took their places between color bearers, who carried American flags and the red and blue "Blood and Fire" inscribed banners of the Salvation Army. The Mayor was the first to speak. He said:

"It gives me much pleasure as Mayor of the City of New York to welcome you, the head of that great organization, the Salvation Army, which was founded and built up by your distinguished father, who devoted his life to the work. Few men have left behind them such a memorial, and to few men has fallen the dignity of a leadership such as has fallen upon you. Well I remember the vicissitudes and hardships the Salvation Army encountered when it began its first work in this section. You met with many rebuffs and discouragements. Confronted by almost overwhelming difficulties your patient workers proclaimed day after day, week after week, and year after year an undenominational Gospel and the duty of self-sacrifice for the benefit of others. Success naturally has followed the efforts of your untiring workers, and as its result the army has reached its present eminent position.

"It is known throughout the globe, and is admitedly a powerful agency in the spread of Christianity. Your practical and humanitarian work has brought relief and courage to many thousands of men and women almost submerged, who have been led by your workers to make renewed attempts to re-establish themselves. On behalf of the people of this community I thank you for the work you have done, Sir, for the benefit of the needy and those who have met with adversity and misfortune. May your organization continue to grow in strength and usefulness. I bid you a most cordial welcome, Gen. Booth, not because you bear a great name, a famous name, but because of the importance of the trust which you have assumed. May your visit here be a most successful one, beneficial alike to our citizens as well as to your fellow-men."

"I thank you for the words you have spoken," said Gen. Booth; "for the generous reception given to me, because it is something that is not deserved by me, for the reason that I get my inspiration from a life work with that splendid old man who was my father. I am in the position of the moon shining by a reflected light. I aspire to be a helper of mankind and you of the army must aspire to be the servants of the city, the State and the nation. Be loyal and true servants and godly Christian men like your Mayor. I thank you, Mr. Mayor, for your speech. I feel that it came from the heart."

The bands then joined in playing "My Country, 'Tis of Thee" as the General and Miss Booth departed from the City Hall.

The parade formed in West Broadway, going to Warren Street to Broadway to Vesey Street to Park Row and thence to the City Hall. This was the order of the parade:

First Division—National Staff Band, colors and escort of Colonels, Brigadiers, and Majors to Gen. Booth and his sister.
Second Division—Boston Provincial Band and New England officers and soldiers.
Third Division—Philadelphia Provincial Band and Atlantic Coast officers and soldiers.
Fourth Division—Harlem Band and Central Province officers and soldiers.
Sixth Division—New York No. 3 Band; Ohio, Kentucky, and Southern officers and soldiers and Michigan and Indiana officers.
Seventh Division—Swedish Band and Scandinavian officers and soldiers.
Eighth Division—Niagara Falls Band and officers and soldiers of the Women's Social Department.
Ninth Division—Central Officers' Band and officers and employes of the Eastern Social Department.
Tenth Division—Brooklyn No. 1 Band and officers and soldiers of the Middle West Social Department.
Eleventh Division—Cadets' Band, and Training College staff and men and women cadets.

Gen. Booth will address a meeting at Carnegie Hall this afternoon at 3 o'clock and will speak again at the Lyric Theatre at 7:30 o'clock in the evening.

FORESTRY FOR CITY PARKS.

Syracuse State College Proposes to Aid Trees of New York.

The Tree Planting Association of New York and the New York State College of Forestry of Syracuse University are to co-operate in establishing a unified, scientific system of tree planting and cultivation in this city. This was agreed upon yesterday at a meeting of the Directors of the Tree Planting Association at which Dean Hugh P. Baker of the State College of Forestry urged co-operation in meeting the needs of the city in this direction.

The school, said the Dean, was not only under obligation to carry on a professional course at the university, but also to do educational work throughout the State and to investigate the many important forest problems. The college, the association, and the city should co-operate in scientifically organizing the planting and cultivation of trees in the parks and streets and other public places.

The Dean then submitted this plan for co-operation:

1. A thorough and careful study by one of the college foresters of the trees of New York City and a submission of a report with recommendations to the Tree Planting Association and the Park Board. The study and report to be made at no expense to the association or the city.

2. The college to aid in publicity work in the city. It is ready to send its foresters to give illustrated lectures before high schools, club

BRIDAL REHEARSAL AT WHITE HOUSE

Miss Jessie Wilson's Wedding Attendants Are All on Hand for Tuesday's Event.

DINNER AT HUGHES HOME

Mrs. Wilson Explains That the Wedding Cake Is of Ordinary Size and Not Elaborate.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 22.—With the arrival at the White House to-day of the three out-of-town bridesmaids, who are to attend Miss Jessie Wilson next Tuesday, all details of the wedding ceremony were completed. These young women are Miss Marjorie Brown of Atlanta, Ga.; Miss Wilson's cousin, Miss Adelaide Scott, the daughter of Prof. William B. Scott of Princeton, and Miss Margy G. White of Baltimore, a classmate of Miss Wilson. They, with Miss Jessie Wilson's two sisters, will complete the bride's party.

The ushers selected by Mr. Sayre are Dr. Gilbert Horax of Montclair, N. J.; Scoville Clarke, of Salem, Mass.; Benjamin Burton and Mr. Charles E. Hughes, Jr. Dr. Wilfred T. Grenfell, the medical missionary of Labrador, will be best man.

The ushers will not all reach Washington until Monday. However a rehearsal was held in the East Room late this afternoon.

Tuesday's company will be only half the size of that witnessing the marriage of Alice Roosevelt. Consequently there will be no crowding in the East Room nor in the State dining room, where there will be tea and the usual afternoon refreshments following the congratulations. The hour of the ceremony, 4:30 o'clock, greatly simplifies this part of the coming wedding and adds to the informal character of the event. An elaborate breakfast was a feature of the Roosevelt wedding, which will go down in history as the merriest ever known in the stately old mansion.

The music of the Marine Band, which will play the wedding march, will be supplemented by choral service arranged by Miss Margaret Wilson, the musician of the family.

Except for the difference in the hour and the presence of five bridal attendants, Miss Jessie Wilson's wedding will be conducted along much the same lines as that of Miss Alice Roosevelt.

Mr. Sayre and Miss Wilson, with those members of the bridal party now in town were guests of Mr. Justice Hughes and Mrs. Hughes at dinner this evening. Dr. and Mrs. Grenfell will not arrive in town until Monday. They will be the guests of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Henry Butler during their stay in Washington. Mrs. Robert H. Sayre, the bridegroom's mother, is expected in Washington this evening and will be a guest at the White House until Wednesday.

While Mr. Sayre's marriage license gives Lancaster, Penn., as his residence, he was born at Bethlehem, Penn. He is a grandson of the Rev. John Nevin, D. D., former President of Franklin and Marshall College of Lancaster, and since the death of his father in 1907 has spent an occasional vacation at the old Nevin homestead there. The romance of Mr. Sayre and Miss Wilson began nearly four years ago at Windsor Forges, Penn., the home of Miss Blanche Nevin, a sister of Mrs. Sayre. It was there that the engagement was announced last Summer.

Col. W. W. Harts, U. S. A., Chief of Public Buildings and Grounds, to-day made public the list of army and navy and marine officers selected to act as aids.

This unusually long list includes, in addition to Col Harts, Capt. Needham Jones, Dr. Cary Grayson, Lieut. F. A. Todd, Lieut. Landon, Lieut. Jones, and Lieut. Galloway, all of the navy; Lieut. C. K. Rockwell, Lieut. Harry Claggett, Lieut. J. B. Aleshire, Lieut. Beverly C. Dunn, Lieut. James A. Derst, all of the army, and Lieut. H. F. Wirgman of the Marine Corps.

These officers will wear full dress uniforms.

Numerous requests for a piece of Miss Jessie Wilson's wedding cake caused this statement to be issued from the White House to-day:

On account of the erroneous and extravagant statements as to the size and cost of the cake which has been baked for the wedding of Miss Jessie Wilson, Mrs. Wilson wishes it stated that the cake is 9 inches high and 22 inches in diameter, is the usual kind of bride's cake, and is not at all elaborate.

CINCINNATI, Nov. 22.—The fact that Miss Jessie Wilson will be married in a costume of purely American production has struck a responsive chord in the hearts of the members of the Chamber of Commerce, with the result that the following telegram has been sent to the future Mrs. Sayre by the Home Products Committee:

We congratulate you on your loyalty to your country in ordering your trousseau entirely of American manufacture. Your patriotism is a good omen, and will do much to further the cause of more patronage of home industries by our people. All good wishes for your happiness.

MISS LUCILLE MAHER WEDS.

Married to Hearn Waters Streat at Her Mother's Home.

The wedding of Miss Lucille Marie Maher, daughter of Mrs. Josephine Maher, to Hearn Waters Streat of this city took place yesterday morning at the home of the bride's mother, 611 West 137th Street. The Rev. Father John H. Dooley of Corpus Christi Chapel, performed the ceremony in the presence of the nearest relatives and a few intimate friends.

The bride wore a traveling gown of dark brown chiffon velvet with a hat to match and a corsage bouquet of orchids. Her sister, Miss Edna Maher, acted as maid of honor, and wore green chiffon velvet topped with a large black picture hat. A. James Eckert of Utica, N. Y., was Mr. Streat's best man. Mr. Streat is a former member of the Seventh Regiment. He and his bride are to spend their honeymoon in Bermuda.

WEDDED IN FLUSHING.

Miss Emily de Neufville Marries Colemann Wynne of Montclair.

Miss Emily Anna Carlotta de Neufville, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. F. August de Neufville of 69 Franklin Place, Flushing, and Colemann Wynne of Montclair, N. J., were married yesterday afternoon in the First Congregational Church, Flushing, by the rector, the Rev. George Drew Egbert.

The bride was attended by Miss Catherine Groot of Brooklyn as maid of honor and Mrs. Robert E. Moffett of Brooklyn and Mrs. Robert O. Miller of Pelham, as matrons of honor. Robert H. de Neufville, a brother of the bride, was best man. The ushers were Edmund Tuttle, 3d, and Colgate Tuttle of Newark, N. J.; Reginald Smith of Manhattan and Estill Brown of Philadelphia.

Bopp-Chatterton Wedding.

The marriage of Miss Ethel L. Chatterton, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John W. Chatterton, to Frederick Bopp will take place at the Scotch Presbyterian Church on Wednesday evening at 8 o'clock, the Rev. Dr. David G. Wylie officiating. The bride will be attended by her sister, Miss Violet E. Chatterton, as maid of honor, and the Misses Mabel Macdonald, Claire Wilks, Margaret Kneland, Louisa Frick, and Adele Merken are to be bridesmaids. Louis Bopp will act as his brother's best man, and the ushers will be C. Raymond Chatterton, brotner of the bride; Harry Topping, Harry Siegmann, Arthur Graef, and Herman Hambrock. After the ceremony a reception and dance will take place at the Hotel St. Andrew.

Heyman-Goldsmith Wedding Dec. 3

Invitations have been issued for the marriage of Miss Birdie Goldsmith of London, England, to Emil Heyman of this city. The wedding will take place at the St. Regis on Wednesday, Dec. 3. Miss Florence Tannenbaum will be the bride's maid of honor and only attendant. Dr. Daniel Poll will act as best man. A reception will be held after the ceremony.

Colwell-Wetzel Wedding.

The wedding of Miss Mabel Wetzel, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Charles F. Wetzel, to Edwin Chesney Colwell of this city will take place at the home of the bride's parents, 72 Riverside Drive, on Wednesday. The Rev. Dr. Henry Sloane Coffin of the Madison Avenue Presbyterian Church will officiate. There are to be no attendants and only the immediate families and a few friends are to attend the ceremony.

Miss Cornelia Penfield Betrothed.

Mr. and Mrs. M. Clinton Penfield of Bridgeport, Conn., have announced the engagement of their daughter, Miss Cornelia Sterrett Penfield, to Henry Monroe Lathrop. Miss Penfield is a member of the National Arts Club and the Equal Franchise Society of this city. Mr. Lathrop is a graduate of Yale, class of '12, and is in business at Johnstown, Penn.

Miss Grace E. Garretson to Wed.

Justice and Mrs. Garretson of Elmhurst, L. I., announce the engagement of their daughter, Miss Grace Eastman Garretson, to John H. Jackson of this city, son of Mrs. Emily Jarvis Jackson and the late John Hora Jackson of Plainfield, N. J., who was for many years a member of the New York bar. Mr. Jackson is a lawyer. No date has been set for the wedding.

Skinner-Ferrin Wedding Nov. 29.

The marriage of Miss Abbe Frances Ferrin, the only daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Charles J. Ferrin, Jr., to Charles Rufus Skinner, Jr., will be celebrated at St. Matthew's Church, West Eighty-fourth Street, on Saturday evening, Nov. 29. The ceremony is to be followed by a reception at the home of the bride's parents, 6 West Ninety-first Street.

Gordon Forbes to Wed Miss Wilson.

The engagement has been announced to their friends of Gordon Forbes, a son of Mr. and Mrs. John Murray Forbes of Morristown, N. J., to Mrs. Frances Wilson of Portland, Ore. Mr. Forbes is a Princeton graduate, class of 1905.

IDEN—BRAZIL.

Special to The New York Times.

NEWPORT, R. I., Nov. 22.—Miss Marianna Brazil, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph T. Brazil, and Surgeon John Howe Iden, U. S. N., were married this afternoon at the home of the bride in Melville, R. I., the ceremony being performed by the Rev. Father Manus De Barrows of St. Anthony's Church, Portsmouth. The bride was attended by her sister, Miss Catherine Brazil, and James Nelson, Manassas, Va., was the best man.

READY TO BUILD BOOTH MEMORIAL

Plans for $450,000 Theatre Near Columbus Circle Completed by Architect Cobb.

RESIDENT STOCK COMPANY

Shakespearean Festival to Open House to be Erected to the Memory of America's Great Tragedian.

Work on another theatre, to be operated along the lines of the once-tried New Theatre, will be started shortly on a site in the vicinity of Columbus Circle. The theatre is to be known as the Edwin Booth Memorial, and will be erected by the Edwin Booth Memorial Corporation. Plans have been completed by Henry Ives Cobb calling for a six-story building to cost $450,000. The auditorium of the theatre, according to Mr. Cobb's plans, will seat 1,528 persons.

The first move was made in this direction early last Summer when papers of incorporation were filed in Albany for the formation of the Edwin Booth Memorial Theatre Corporation, with the avowed purpose of erecting a monument that would serve to uphold the dignity of the national stage. Much speculation was indulged in concerning the idea, some even going so far as to dismiss the entire project as a wild scheme that would never materialize. But the continued activity on the part of the men behind it gradually caused the rumors to subside in favor of serious consideration.

It is promised that the theatre will be a distinctly American institution, erected to the memory of an American artist by American capital and with national ideals.

In the Board of Directors of the Booth Memorial Corporation are J. J. Loochem, George W. Lederer, Richard Morrell, R. V. Thompson, Richard H. Woolfall, Dr. Joseph Wickham, and W. W. Randall, with the reins of general management in the hands of Nelson Roberts.

A Shakespearean festival will open the theatre in all probability. This does not imply that the house is to be given over exclusively to plays by that poet. But as Booth made his greatest success in Shakespeare, the pieces are regarded as the proper ones with which to inaugurate the first season. A stock company is to occupy the theatre, and the attractions will be successful, proved plays.

The construction of the building will be of steel as far as the frame is concerned, and the rest of it of stone and cement. The finish of the auditorium will be with half-pillars round about, the general decoration being in ivory and gold.

The measurements of the proscenium opening are 38 feet on the curtain line and 48 feet high, while the stage itself is 40 feet deep and 88 feet wide at the back. Nevertheless, it will be observed that everything is planned for the moderately intimate type of playhouse, where the most delicate effects may be appreciated along with the broad sweeps of character and scene.

The hall of the theatre is one of the most important features. It will measure 45 by 80 feet, being large enough to accommodate clubs and conventions having to do with the theatre. Along the walls will be alcoves, in turn divided into compartments for books and relics of the drama. This part of the hall is devoted principally to collections for the information and delight of the Shakespearean scholar as well as for the edification of the serious student of the theatre. The whole idea, say the promoters, is to foster in every possible way an appreciation of the best that the drama has to afford.

Four floors above will be devoted to studios, ten to a floor. It will readily be appreciated that in a project of this kind advantage must be taken of every possible source of income. Public support alone cannot make possible the extremely high quality of production necessary, or at least maintain it after it is once begun. It is believed that the revenue derived from these studios and from the restaurant below, supplemented by the house receipts, will make many big things possible that would otherwise be prohibitive.

Above the studios will be an Italian Garden Theatre, decorated in conformation to the style of the large auditorium. It will be finished in copper and gold and bronze and white, all in the Empire style. Just what this theatre is to be used for depends on the circumstances. In any case it will be devoted to those special performances and occasional lectures, perhaps, for which the regular auditorium would be too large. Eleven exits, including the main one, are planned for the theatre.

The means of reaching the upper floors are two large elevators with a combined capacity of approximately 150 persons. Both run to the top. Provision is made for emergency exits by connecting two fire towers to the building, one for the roof theatre alone, and the other opening on each floor.

DANCE AT PLAZA FOR CHARITY

Benefit for East Side Settlement House on Dec. 4.

A dance is to be given on Thursday evening, Dec. 4, in the ballroom of the Plaza for the benefit of the East Side Settlement House.

The patronesses include Mrs. Charles Smithers, Mrs. Charles Steele, Mrs. Oliver Harriman, Mrs. William Ross Proctor, Mrs. Joseph W. Harriman, Mrs. Christopher D. Smithers, Mrs. W. A. Read, Mrs. A. Verdi's opera "Un Ballo in Maschera" was heard at the Metropolitan Opera House at the first matinée of the season yesterday, for the first time since February, 1905. Half a dozen performances of it had been given since that time by Mr. Hammerstein in his first two seasons at the Manhattan Opera House, but the opera is not a familiar one to at least the younger generation of opera goers. To many of these it came as a new experience; to others as the revival of almost forgotten memories.

The opera seems to-day old-fashioned, naturally; it is in Verdi's "middle period" style of 1859. It is an opera for singers accomplished in the art of ornamental song, and for their opportunity chiefly, no doubt, it was revived at the Metropolitan at this time—for them, and with a thought, perhaps, of the centenary year of the composer. But thoughts of composers in the opera houses of to-day are generally afterthoughts.

There is opportunity in "Un Ballo in Maschera" for some dramatic expression, however, in both song and action. And this is especially true now that some of the most glaring absurdities have been eliminated from the setting of the opera in this production. There is no longer a Governor of Boston, Mass.; a Creole secretary, a negro witch, a palace filled with Puritan courtiers in their sober garb, or disguised as Neapolitan fishermen. Both Boston and Naples having been eliminated, the action is made to take place in some undesignated country. This fact, of course, has little bearing on the merits or interest of the opera itself, except that it does away with matters to which opera goers of fifty years ago were indifferent, but which would greatly annoy the eye, jar upon the intelligence, and spoil what pleasure their successors of to-day may find in the work. There are enough absurdities of the conventional operatic type left in it.

There are pleasing numbers that, as "numbers," may still give pleasure; numerous airs and concerted pieces, with which the principal characters are copiously supplied, and spirited choruses. Many of these were properly enjoyed. The opera, in fact, was indulgently contemplated by the enormous matinée audience yesterday afternoon, and with some enthusiasm. The enthusiasm was eminently deserved by the performance which was a remarkably fine one, carried through with Mr. Toscanini's clear-cut brilliancy and precision, and his warmth of sensuous melodic expression in the orchestra. The cast was one of the most distinguished the company could afford. M. Caruso's singing as Ricardo was in his very best style, beautiful in tone, phrasing, and expression, and without his besetting exaggerations. Mme. Hempel sang the light-hearted music of Oscar the page with quite the right touch, and Mme. Destinn, Mme. Matzenauer and M. Amato maintained the high standard that was set.

The mounting of the opera was sumptuous. The scenes in the palace and in the open are well designed and painted, and the costumes, which are now of the seventeenth century, are handsome. Nothing, in fact, in the mounting or in the performance has made it as effective as the opera can be made was omitted by the management. With all this, however, "Un Ballo in Maschera" seems out of its century at the Metropolitan Opera House this season.

MISS GILBERT'S DEBUT.

Mrs. R. M. Gilbert Gives Reception and Theatre Party for Daughter.

Mrs. Riley M. Gilbert of 563 Park Avenue gave a reception yesterday afternoon, followed by a theatre party and supper, for her daughter, Miss Annie Gilbert, who made her début.

Miss Gilbert was in blue brocade and lace and Miss Gilbert in silver brocade, having a white tulle minaret tunic with touches of silver, carried a sheaf of lilies of the valley and forget-me-nots tied with blue ribbons. Miss Mary Frances Gilbert, who is not yet out, wore a cerise net and satin frock embroidered in gold.

The Misses Virginia Scully, Katharine Smith, and Evangeline Hill also assisted in greeting the guests.

The additional guests for the theatre party and supper were John Noble Stearns, Jr.; William Lummis, Watson Leonhauser, Robertson Cleveland, and Powell Crichton.

TEA FOR VISITING OFFICERS.

Foreign Army Men, Here for Horse Show, Are Entertained.

The Belgian, French, and Norwegian officers, who took part in the Horse Show at Madison Square Garden, were entertained at tea at the Hotel Plaza yesterday afternoon. The Belgian officers were Count d'Oultremont, Chevalier Edouard de Schiller, and Commandant Victor Nyssens, and the French officers were Lieut. Marquis de Orgeitt, Lieut. de Lassardieres, and Lieut. Baron de Merlin. Lieut. Helberg of the Norwegian Dragoons represented the Norwegian officers.

Other guests were Mr. and Mrs. George Townsend, Mr. and Mrs. W. K. Townsend, Mr. and Mrs. Owen Johnson, Mrs. Frank Vaughan, Mr. and Mrs. Charles White Trippe, Miss Ingersoll, Mr. and Mrs. McCrea, Miss Martindale, Mrs. Richard Phelps, Marquis Spinolo, Gen. and Mrs. H. L. Burnett, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Wilkinson, and Miss Mary Harrington. The tables were decorated with flowers and flags of the different nations.

Social Incidents.

Countess Moltke arrived yesterday from Lancaster, Mass., and will be at the Ritz-Carlton for several weeks.

Mr. and Mrs. Hendricks H. Whitman of 969 Park Avenue are being congratulated on the birth of a daughter at their home. Mrs. Whitman is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Hobart C. Chatfield-Taylor of Lake Forest, Ill.

Mr. and Mrs. William R. Willcox have closed their country place, Wofton, at Locust Valley, L. I., and have taken apartments at 635 Park Avenue for the Winter.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Hoe, who will spend the early part of the Winter at Mrs. Robert Hoe's place at Bedford Hills, N. Y., are on a motoring trip, and yesterday attended the Yale-Harvard football game at Boston.

Mr. and Mrs. P. S. Brown of Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, Canada, and their daughter, Mrs. McCormach, have been spending a few days in New York, and attended the Horse Show. They are at the Hotel Victoria.

Mrs. Charles H. Truax is giving an entertainment to-night at her home, 667 Madison Avenue.

Mrs. William Lee Ward of 127 West Seventieth Street is giving a reception for her only and débutante daughter, Miss Virginia C. Ward, at her home on Wednesday afternoon, Nov. 26. A small dance will follow the reception for the receiving party.

Mr. and Mrs. Murray Humber Marais will be at 171 Edgecombe Avenue for the Winter. Mrs. Marais was Miss Anna B. Stambaugh, youngest daughter of the late Mr. and Mrs. John Philip Stambaugh of Baltimore, Md., and her marriage to Mr. Marais, who is the son of Albert Marais of the French diplomatic service, took place at the Church of St. Mary the Virgin, on Oct. 25.

Mr. and Mrs. James W. Hawes have returned to the Ansonia for the Winter.

Mrs. Samuel James Latta and her son, S. Cowen Latta, have returned to New York, and are at the Pasadena, 10 West Sixty-first Street.

Mrs. Samuel W. Andrews will give a reception at her home, 675 Madison Avenue, on Jan. 8, to introduce her daughter, Miss Naomi Andrews.

Mr. and Mrs. James D. Mortimer have returned to the city, and will be at the Apthorpe for the Winter.

Mrs. R. H. Williams, wife of Capt. Williams of Fort Hamilton, gave a luncheon of twelve covers on Wednesday.

WARNING.

The Christmas Number of The New York Times, on Sunday, Dec. 7, will be sold out far ahead of time. If you want the sections containing the Sargent paintings and The Girl of To-day, the only way to get them is to order early.—Adv.

MRS. BERTHA R. FRANK DIES

Widow Gave $250,000 to Jewish and Non-Sectarian Charities.

Mrs. Bertha Rayner Frank, widow of Dr. Samuel Leon Frank and a sister of the late United States Senator from Maryland, Isidor Rayner, died at 2 o'clock yesterday afternoon at her apartments at 645 West End Avenue. Mrs. Frank, who had lived nearly all of her life in Baltimore, where she was widely known for her philanthropic work, came to this city two months ago. She was stricken with paralysis recently, and pneumonia developed.

Mrs. Frank was born in Baltimore sixty-six years ago, the daughter of the late William S. and Amalie Rayner. There were four other children—George W. Rayner, who died several years ago; the late Isidor Rayner, and Albert W. Rayner and Mrs. Joseph L. Straus, both of whom are living in Baltimore.

Dr. Frank died in the Summer of 1906, and since that time Mrs. Frank had devoted herself almost entirely to her many philanthropies. A fortune of $250,000 left by her husband she gave to Jewish and non-sectarian charities, about $100,000 of it going for the erection of a large addition to the Hebrew Hospital at Baltimore, as a memorial to her husband. Mrs. Frank's charities were widespread. She contributed to and was interested in the work of practically every Jewish institution in Baltimore for the assistance of the poor and afflicted. She was a liberal contributor to the Society of the Daughters of Israel, and established an immigration agency in Baltimore under the auspices of the Council of Jewish Women for the protection of Jewish immigrant girls. Mrs. Frank was also interested in the Clara Hirsch Home for Girls, and gave her father's former home in Madison Avenue, Baltimore, for a home for nurses.

For many years Mrs. Frank maintained a Sabbath school for the poorer Jewish children in the eastern section of that city, and, in fact, her benefactions were so many and so quietly conducted that little was known of many of them by the public. When her recent illness became known she received many letters from those she had befriended in their times of distress. She had founded a number of scholarships, it became known, which helped young men and women in their fight to get ahead in the world.

Mrs. Frank had made her home in the Winter, not infrequently, at Lakewood, N. J., where she was widely known. More than five years ago she built there the first Jewish synagogue, which served as a great impetus to the religious movement in the section. Now a rabbi has been provided who conducts the services each week. Mrs. Frank had been for years an invalid.

Prof. John Eastman Clarke.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Mass., Nov. 22.—Prof. John Eastman Clarke of the Faculty of Boston University died this morning at his home in Cambridge. His health of late had been so poor that a few weeks ago he received a year's leave of absence. Prof. Clarke was born in Prospect, Me., July 2, 1850. He was graduated from Boston University in 1878, and in 1882 obtained the degree of Ph. D. in the same college. He studied at Harvard and Chicago Universities, and in 1885-6 attended Berlin University, Germany. In 1908 he attended the College de France at Sorbonne, Paris, France. EDOUARDO LOCKROY DEAD.

French Statesman and Naval Writer Was 75 Years Old.

Edouardo Lockroy, one of the best-known French statesmen and writers, died yesterday at his home in Paris of an affection of the heart, at the age of 75 years. Mr. Lockroy held portfolios in a number of the Cabinets, first as Minister of Commerce, then as Minister of Public Instruction, and finally as Minister of Marine. He was the first civilian to hold the latter office since the fall of the Empire. Most of his youth, however, was spent at sea, and he traveled in many lands and fought in not a few—in Sicily with Garibaldi, in Syria with the expedition sent out by Napoleon III., and in Paris in 1870 against the Germans as commander of the Octroi employes, one of the stoutest brigades engaged in the defense of the capital.

M. Lockroy's writings on naval questions were widely read. He was a member of the French National Assembly before the Chamber of Deputies was organized, and was Deputy Speaker of the Chamber from 1902 to 1905.

M. Lockroy, whose real name was Etienne Auguste Edouard Simon, was born in Paris on July 18, 1838. He married the widow of Victor Hugo's son in 1877. When he became Minister of Marine, M. Lockroy began a reorganization of the French fleet as well as the naval defenses of his country, which he declared were in a deplorable condition.

Father of Labor Day Dead.

George McGuire, who was known in labor circles as "The Father of Labor Day," died on last Friday night at his home in Manchester, N. H. Mr. McGuire, who was a cigarmaker, first made the suggestion of a labor holiday at a labor convention in Chicago in 1884. He renewed the suggestion at later conventions, and from his efforts resulted the wide observance of Labor Day.

Marriage and death notices intended for insertion in The New York Times may be telephoned to 1000 Bryant.

TREASURY BLOCKS CUT IN CIRCULATION

Refuses to Let National Reserve Withdraw 2 Per Cent. Bonds to Substitute for 3s.

FORCES A CUT IN DEPOSITS

Only by This Means Is the Bank Able to Get Possession of Its Bonds for Delivery to a Customer.

Bankers in this city were puzzled yesterday to find what application the explanation made by the Treasury Department on Friday had to certain cases of practical refusal by the department to permit national banks to cancel part of their circulation and withdraw the bonds deposited to secure it.

The explanation of the Treasury Department was that it had made a rule to refuse to allow any national bank to retire its circulation and withdraw the Government bonds put up as security for such circulation "when the purpose was to obtain Government bonds for use as security for deposits of Government money as loans to the banks for crop-moving and similar uses." Only in isolated cases of this sort, it was asserted, had the Government tried to block retirement of circulation. It was conceded that the banks had a legal right to retire their circulation and withdraw their bonds. On the other hand it was discretionary with the department whether it would or would not deposit part of the crop-moving money in a given bank.

What bankers here could not understand, however, was such experiences as that of the National Reserve Bank of New York City, whose desire to reduce its circulation had nothing to do with obtaining additional Government deposits for crop-moving or any other purpose.

The statement of the National Reserve Bank shows it to be the owner of nearly $700,000 of Government bonds. In the last two years and a half it has bought more than $550,000 of these, and sold none until a few weeks ago, so that it was not open to the suspicion of the Treasury Department that New York banks were selling bonds to depress their price and discredit the Owen-Glass bill.

In the ordinary course of business the National Reserve Bank had occasion to sell $45,000 of its 3 per cent. bonds, and did so. It so happened that all but four of its 3 per cents. were on deposit to secure its regular Government deposits of $50,000, which it received last February, when the Government transferred most of its banking operations to the banks. To secure its circulation it had on deposit the other four 3 per cents., and several hundred thousand dollars of 2 per cents. It was not an applicant for any of the crop-moving funds or for any deposits in addition to the regular $50,000.

It notified the Treasury Department that it wanted to retire $45,000 of its circulation, withdrawing the four 3 per cents, and forty-one 2 per cents. Then it wanted to substitute these forty-one 2 per cents for the same number of 3 per cents that were up to secure the $50,000 deposits.

This would have put it in possession of its forty-five 3 per cents for delivery to the purchaser and would have left it with its $50,000 deposit secured by 2 per cents entirely and its circulation reduced by $45,000.

The Treasury Department, while not denying its right to reduce its circulation and draw down $45,000 of bonds, would not permit the substitution of any of the bonds so withdrawn for the 3 per cents securing the $50,000 deposit. Many letters and telegrams were exchanged, and it is said that one of the officers of the bank went to Washington and saw Assistant Secretary John Skelton Williams personally, but without success.

The National Reserve then proposed to reduce its circulation $4,000 and give up $41,000 of its Government deposits in order to get the bonds, the delivery of which was being demanded by the purchaser. Mr. Williams could offer no objection to this, but notified the bank that if it gave up all but $9,000 of its deposits in this way it would cease to be a Government depositary, as it could not be recognized as such unless it kept at least $10,000 of the Government's money.

The bank finally gave up $40,000 of its deposits to conform to this condition, reduced its circulation $4,000 and went into the market and bought the odd bond necessary to complete the lot it had sold. In doing so, it had to pay more for the odd bond than the price at which it had sold it.

COMMON CAR OWNERSHIP.

Newman Erb Has Plan for Supplying Needed Equipment.

Newman Erb, President of the Minneapolis & St. Louis, has been quietly sounding railway men on a proposition to solve the problem of obtaining sufficient equipment for the railways by the formation of an association to buy and hold cars for common use. His plan contemplates the purchase by the association of 200,000 freight cars, the railways to put up $25,000,000 of the cost and to finance the remainder through the sale of equipment bonds. Mr. Erb outlines his plan as follows:

"The present condition of the railroads has become alarmingly serious, and their credit is now impaired to the point where additional burden has been put upon them in the large interest charges for their money requirements, difficult for them to obtain except through makeshift temporary loans, besides the increase in the cost of transportation.

"It appears to me that the nationalization of our railroads is inevitable if they are to meet the requirements of the future, unless they are placed upon an earning basis that will increase the factor of safety to investors and give them a stability which has been progressively undermined since the Interstate Commerce Commission was invested with authority to control rate-making, an authority which has since been exercised almost continually downward.

"Our railroads are obliged each to furnish a large proportion of cars for interline, interstate, and interchange traffic. Under existing conditions, the burden of supplying the equipment used for this tonnage movement should be borne in common by the carriers, and none of them should be individually burdened, under conditions that involve a strain upon their credit and prevent or embarrass them from readily obtaining money at reasonable rates for their local needs.

"It occurred to me, therefore, as it has to other railway executives, that a plan for an association, financed by the companies in common, for the purchase of equipment to be used in interline traffic would meet the present difficulty. Twenty-five million dollars, distributed in five annual installments of $5,000,000 each, contributed by the railroads of our country distributed on a mileage basis, would mean $20 per annum per mile for five years, or, if distributed on a tonnage-density basis, would still be unimportant and furnish with the period named enough to justify a credit of $200,000,000, sufficient to purchase 200,000 cars.

"I am convinced that with the joint credit, 20 or 25 year serial equipment bonds could be marketed readily from time to time, and with the cars acquired, distributed as required by the association in control, they would earn through the per diem charge more than sufficient to pay the interest requirements, renewals, insurance, and principal."

BOSTON COPPER GOSSIP.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Nov. 22.—Giroux Consolidated reports an October output of 160,911 pounds of copper. This compares with 204,307 pounds in September, the decrease being attributed to interruption caused by installation of steam shovel equipment.

Tuolumne in October produced 26,043 tons of ore which yielded at the smelter 192,920 pounds of copper, 12,500 ounces of silver, and 17½ ounces of gold. The ore averaged close to 4½ per cent. copper. Operations for the month show a profit of $3,000.

It is reported that the Lake Copper Mine has been shut down and the water allowed to accumulate. When the strike is over the mine can be unwatered in thirty days, the Directors say.

North Butte, with 1,000 men employed, mined 40,000 tons of ore in October, yielding some 2,500,000 pounds of copper. The outlook for this month is 45,000 tons of ore.

Hole No. 33 at Mayflower is 1,600 feet deep, and has shown no important development. Sinking will be continued. Hole No. 32 has been discontinued at 1,115 feet, and a new hole, No. 33, has been started.

Some very rich silver ore is reported from the new mines belonging to Anaconda in the Flathead country.

The new strike in the Superior and Boston mine is 350 feet from the present shipping slope and in an upraise from the eighth level.

Nevada-Douglas mined 583,330 pounds of copper in October, the ore assaying 6.45 per cent.

Victoria's rock is at present yielding 13 pounds of copper per ton—a decided improvement.

Granby Consolidated is reported to have earned $90,000 net in October.

Iron Cap is said to be maintaining its record output.

Utah Copper's October output was 10,236,575 pounds of copper, against 11,817,428 in September and 2,128,792 in October, 1912.

Calumet and Arizona smelter turned out 4,500,000 pounds of copper in October. In September it was 4,400,000, and in October, 1912, it was 4,404,000 pounds.

East Butte is hoisting 325 tons of high-grade rock daily and is developing deeper territory in its Pittsmont property.

Quincy is developing rich copper ground at great depths in Shafts 6 and 8.

LATEST CUSTOMS RULINGS.

Drinking Straws Classified, Also Lava Stones and Soap Powder.

The Board of United States General Appraisers sustained yesterday a protest by M. Loewenstein, and held that drinking straws are properly dutiable under Paragraph 480, Tariff act of 1909, as non-enumerated manufactured articles. The Collector's action in returning the goods at 35 per cent. ad valorem under Paragraph 463, as manufactures of straw, was reversed.

The Manufacturers' Paper Company was sustained in a controversy with the Government regarding the classification of dressed lava stones used in the construction of machinery in paper mills. Duty was assessed by the Collector at New York at the rate of 20 per cent. ad valorem under Paragraph 114, Act of 1909, as manufactures of stone. The board held that the merchandise was dutiable property at 35 per cent. under Paragraph 93 as articles of earthy or mineral substances.

The board granted lower duty on importations of Sapon powder imported by J. MacPherson, New York. Appraiser Higgins returned the goods for duty as a chemical mixture, and duty was demanded by the Collector at the rate of 25 per cent. ad valorem under Paragraph 3, Act of 1909. The importer said the goods were dutiable under Paragraph 69 at the rate of 20 per cent. as soap not specially provided for.

Arbuckle Brothers and B. H. Howell, Son & Co. complained of excessive weights returned by Government weighers on sugar importations. The protests were overruled, as the importers failed to substantiate their claims.

AGAIN RE-ELECT GOMPERS.

No Change in Presidency of A. F. L. —Meet in Philadelphia Next Year.

SEATTLE, Washington, Nov. 22.—The American Federation of Labor to-day re-elected Samuel Gompers President and voted to hold the 1914 convention in Philadelphia.

Other officers chosen were First Vice President, James Duncan; Second Vice President, James O'Connell; Third Vice President, Dennis A. Hayes; Fourth Vice President, Joseph H. Valentine; Fifth Vice President, John R. Alpine; Sixth Vice President, H. B. Perham; Seventh Vice President, John P. White, President of the United Mine Workers of America; Eighth Vice President, Frank Duffy, General Secretary of the Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners; Treasurer, John B. Lennon, and Secretary, Frank Morrison.

In this list are only two new men, White and Duffy. Second Vice President John Mitchell and Fifth Vice President William D. Huber retired voluntarily.

For one delegate to the British Trades Union Congress W. D. Mahon, International President of the Brotherhood of Street and Electric Railway Employes, was elected over Councilman Frederick L. Wheeler of Los Angeles by a vote of 14,663 to 3,854. John Mitchell nominated Mahon, and Wheeler's vote was looked on as a test of Socialist s rewrth.

The final day of the convention opened with the report of the Committee on Resolutions requesting a Federal investigation of charges that several Michigan copper companies obtained possession of land illegally.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

City.

The Municipal Civil Service Commission has approved the following:

Report of Mr. Fuld of his investigation of the third group of candidates on the list of assistant engineer, Grade C. He recommends that the report be filed.

Request of Commissioner of Public Works, Manhattan, for approval of the reinstatement of James Flynn, rammer.

Letter from Mr. Coffey recommending that a leave of absence for three months be granted to Joseph F. Brady, clerk in the Labor Bureau.

Report of Mr. Coffey recommending that the reinstatement of James Rauhfeder as a flagger in the employ of the President of the Borough of Brooklyn be approved.

Report of Mr. Coffey on the request of the Department of Docks and Ferries for the transfer of John Mercer from Rockland to laborer Mr. Coffey recommends that the transfer be disapproved, on the reason that there is a preferred list of forty laborers in existence, and the further reason that the proposed transfer cannot be considered a demotion for the reason that an increase in salary is involved.

Report of Mr. Peffey recommending that the name of Samuel Pachter be removed from the disqualified list, on which it was placed upon his dismissal as driver in the Department of Street Cleaning, the Commissioner of Street Cleaning having consented to his re-employment in this department.

United States.

The United States Civil Service Commission announces an open competitive examination at the New York Custom House for general mechanic, for men only, on Dec. 10, to fill vacancies as they may occur in the department service at Washington, D. C., and other services. The usual entrance salary is $720 a year. It is desired to obtain eligibles who are capable carpenters or cabinetmakers. Applicants must also have had experience in as many other lines as possible, such as painting, plumbing, electric work, operation of pumps and motors, and the care of steam-heating plants. The higher ratings in training and experience will be given to those who show the widest range of experience. A full and complete statement of all experience had by the applicant should be given in his application. Competitors will be examined in spelling, arithmetic, letter writing, penmanship, copying from plain copy, and training and experience. Applicants must have reached their twentieth but not their forty-fifth birthday on the date of the examination and must be physically sound and ablebodied. Further information may be obtained from the United States Civil Service Commission, Washington, D. C.

EDUCATION NOTES.

The Christmas school holidays this year will end with Jan. 1, which falls on a Thursday.

City Supt. Maxwell's annual report is nearly completed. It is expected that proof sheets of it will be ready for presentation to the Board of Education at its meeting on Dec. 10. The Committee on Elementary Schools will hold a meeting on Tuesday. Owing to the court decision of the case of Mrs. Bridget C. Peixotto it is unlikely that the similar case of Mrs. Sarah C. Martin of Public School 10, Wakefield, the Bronx, will be considered at that meeting. Mrs. Martin adopted successful tactics in her defense against the charge of neglect of duty preferred against her by Department Supt. Taylor for absenting herself from school to give birth to a child. The charges were preferred last Spring. Mrs. Martin asked for an adjournment of the hearing, which was granted. Then the Summer holidays were at hand, and there is a rule preventing the Board of Education putting teachers on trial during that time. There was further delay when the current school session began, but the case was finally put on the calendar for a hearing the early part of this month. Mrs. Peixotto's appeal to the courts, however, induced the committee to put Mrs. Martin's case off until the meeting next Friday. It is now believed it will be again adjourned pending the result of the Corporation Counsel's appeal from Justice Seabury's decision in Mrs. Peixotte's favor. Mrs. Martin, having been suspended, is not receiving any salary.

An examination of eligible women applicants for license as teacher of an ungraded class of mentally sub-normal pupils in elementary schools will be held at the Board of Education Hall and Dec. 15 and 16, beginning at 9 A. M. Applicants must be at least 18 years of age, and must have had at least three years of successful experience in teaching.

Announcement is made of two professional examinations of eligible applicants for License 1, to be held for men at the Board of Education Hall, and for women at Public School 27 on Jan. 8 and 9 and June 8 and 9.

Former City Supt. John Jasper is reported to be in fairly good health. He takes a short walk daily.

CORNELL RUNNERS AGAIN IN THE LEAD

Ithacans Capture the Cross-Country Run Title for the Thirteenth Time.

BOYD FIRST MAN HOME

Harvard Gains Individual Honors in Annual Race Over Van Cortlandt Park Course.

Cornell's hill and dale champions won the intercollegiate cross-country team honors yesterday over the Van Cortlandt Park course of six miles before a crowd of probably 20,000 persons, with Harvard second, and Massachusetts Institute of Technology, third. R. St. B. Boyd, the Captain of the Crimson team, was the individual winner in 34 minutes 37 seconds.

The winning score was the highest ever made by a victorious quintet for the honors and showed the runners from Lake Cayuga aggregating the tally with 68 points, while the others totalled as follows: Harvard, 92; Technology, 103; Pennsylvania, 107; Princeton, 114; Dartmouth, 125; Brown, 143; Yale, 146; Syracuse, 224; Penn State, 236; Columbia, 333; Michigan, 335, and College of City of New York unfinished, but four men showing past the line. Of the fifteen races held Cornell has won thirteen times, and Harvard and Yale once each.

Thirteen teams had representatives in the event, Colgate being the only absentee from the original list of nominations. All the teams, with the exception of Brown, Michigan, and Penn State sent seven men to the mark, while these three had their colors sported by but six men each. Eighty-eight men accepted the starting signal.

On the whole the four score and eight made a brave showing, and displayed the results of a long preparation for this most strenuous of running events in the intercollegiate list of sports. Nine of the lads failed to finish, seven succumbing before the journey was finished, while M. Horst, of Penn State was just able to topple over the line.

Still another, H. S. Litchfield, a Brown University sophomore, got to within five yards of the finish, only to fall in a state of absolute collapse. He had been toddling along for the final two hundreds yards very much after the fashion of a child in its first efforts at walking, and reeled from one side of the homestretch to the other, as though his leg muscles were refusing to accept the commands of his will.

With agony depicted in every expression, Litchfield made what proved to be futile efforts to reach his goal, and although his place at that time, sixty-first, would not have availed his team of any benefit, he made one last attempt to bridge the distance between himself and the line by a stride of not more than a foot, with the result that he fell in his plucky but futile effort.

His condition appeared so serious that James E. Sullivan, the referee, picked him up and carried him to the side lines, fearing that the rest of the runners might hurt him and add to his unfortunate condition. Those of his mates who had finished did the best they could to temporarily allay his sufferings, as his blanched look betokened every appearance of poor heart condition. He was finally aided from the field, but after a spell the runner again recovered a normal state.

It was the opinion among close observers that a number of the lads had not been properly prepared as to stamina and idea of pace throughout such a contest. Many of the runners were nearly "cooked" after the first round of three miles despite the fact that the course is not the hardest one in the territory to race over. Some of the runners could barely finish, thus showing that they were either "stale," or had not had sufficient work over a distance at the sport.

Aside from a slight haze in the atmosphere, the afternoon was almost perfect for the race. The arrangements were all that could be desired, the police surveillance of Inspector Morris, aided by Capt. McCune, filling the bill in that department. Park Commissioner Thomas J. Higgins was a cavalry corps in himself, and accompanied on horseback the leaders in the event to help provide a fair field and no favor.

Never before in Metropolitan athletics of the kind has such a crowd viewed the sport. There was probably no point along the whole circuit of three miles which did not contain its quota of enthusiasts, who had been attracted out of curiosity, or because of the desire to help some of their college mates by the host of students who appeared on the scene.

Prior to the event the coaches and managers of eight of the teams asserted that each had winning chances, but after the first round had been made the hopes of all but Cornell, Harvard, and Pennsylvania went a-glimmering. As the total shows the Ithacans had the best balanced quintet, Harvard lacking a good fifth man, while the Quakers were thrown a long way back by the backward position of one of the best men on the team, Madeira, who failed to do the things expected of him, and finished in forty-fifth position.

It was the second climb of the golf links hill that proved to be the undoing of Madeira who, despite the fact that he was fourth at the top of the hill and coming on to the old aqueduct, with three and a half miles behind him, found that the climbing seemed to sapped his efforts, to the end that from that time on he began to "back up," thus putting an end to Pennsy's chances of cutting much figure in the team totals.

On the other hand, the Cornellians' inured to the temporary hardships of the game through their preliminary work, paved the way to ultimate success by having most of their men within hailing distance of each other during the early stages of the contest, which system warranted them in racing four men of the first fifteen across the line.

Harvard was in a somewhat similar predicament to that which confronted Pennsylvania. The Crimson, aside from getting the winner home, placed three more men in the first twenty-two, but received their set-back when Boynton could do no better than forty-sixth.

There was little time wasted in preliminaries, and one minute before the appointed time, 3 o'clock, the starter's gun barked out, sending the army on its six-mile journey. The first part of the course, a straightaway dash over velvety turf of 150 yards, found each of the runners seemingly anxious to take up the position of pacemaker.

At the turn after this distance had been covered and the dash toward the old Colonial Manor house a trio of Harvard runners were in the van. The coach of the Crimson men, Alfred Shrubb, had given his charges orders to get out of the ruck early, and Southworth, Boyd, and Blackman obeyed the instructions to the letter by setting a merry clip for the others to follow.

When the railroad bridge, a half mile from the start, had been reached it was the Crimsoned-jerseyed Captain, Boyd, who was leading the procession, and the further he ran the greater became his lead. Racing like the team after they had scurried over the hill on the golf links, which has a rise of 140 feet in the half mile, and up to the somewhat level running on the old aqueduct it was Blackman and Boyd, the Harvard standard bearers, whose colors flashed in the van.

Through the trees coming down the hill which marked the mile and three-quarter point the big field presented a picturesque appearance. The slight run down hill for the next three-quarters of a mile gave the men a chance to extend

NAVY WINS EASILY.

New York University Eleven Closes Season Without Scoring.

Special to The New York Times.

ANNAPOLIS, Md., Nov. 22.—New York University failed in its effort to score against the midshipmen this afternoon, and thereby closed the season without scoring a point against an opponent. The figures of to-day's game were 48 to 0. Only about half of the middies who will start the game against West Point were in the line-up, and most of those taken out after a short period of play. However the team that opposed the New Yorkers was much heavier and stronger, as well as decidedly better trained than the visitors.

The Navy coaches maintained their policy of changing players rapidly, and this secured a sustained attack that the violet team was not able to meet. New York played a plucky game on the defense, but its line was not comparable to that of the Navy even when the substitutes and second string men were largely used, the Navy keeping in one or two of the regulars to steady it.

The heavy Navy backs rammed through at nearly every period of the game, and it was this style of play that led to most of the scoring. New York succeeded in making first down twice through a series of line plays, Baker, Von Meachow, and Huntley carrying the ball, and twice a forward pass from Huntley to Hollander secured fifteen yards or better. Attempts to circle the Navy ends failed dismally and were often stopped for losses.

Nicholls thrilled the Navy stand at the start of the game by receiving the ball on the kickoff, and, running from his 15-yard line for a touchdown. It was the longest run by ten yards made on the Navy field this year. He remained in the game but a short time, but made several other substantial gains. Alexander scored a touchdown in the same quarter after Blodgett, Nicholls, and Bates had made a series of gains.

Just after Nicholls had made his long run, Baker recovered a fumble by the Navy and ran twenty-five yards to the Navy's 30-yard line. It was the closest the visitors were to the Navy's goal line during the game. In the second quarter Leonard and Mitchell scored touchdowns for the Navy, Leonard kicking both goals. The New Yorkers held the Navy scoreless in the third quarter. The line-up:

Naval Acad'y	Position.	N. Y. Univ'y.
Ingram	Left end	McCullough
De Roode	Left tackle	Witmer
Howe	Left guard	Hollander
Wicks	Centre	Rathbaum
Vaughan	Right guard	Torrence

New York University: Van Clief for McCullough, O'Donnell for Hollander, Steuart for O'Donnell, Bristol for Rathbaum, Zeyas for Hollander, Muller for Waldman, Burke for Huntley, Brown for McDermott, Burke for Baker, Baker for Burke, Parke for Von Meachow.

Auburn Champion of South.

ATLANTA, Ga., Nov. 22.—Auburn to-day won the football championship of the Southern Intercollegiate Athletic Association for 1913 by defeating the University of Georgia here, 21 to 7. The team from Alabama won by using what is known as "straight football."

Kentucky State Wins Title.

LOUISVILLE, Ky., Nov. 22.—By defeating the University of Louisville here to-day, 20 to 0, Kentucky State University, Lexington, won the State football championship.

CHICAGO FOOTBALL CHAMPION OF WEST

Wisconsin Outclassed by Maroons Throughout in Deciding Conference Game.

CHICAGO, Nov. 22.—Outclassing, outgaming, and outlucking their opponents, University of Chicago football stars defeated the University of Wisconsin men, 19 to 0, to-day and captured the undisputed title of conference champion. Battering the Badgers to bits, the Maroons wound up their 1913 campaign with a victory so lopsided that it left no doubt of their right to the game and the title.

The rout of the Badgers was a fitting climax to the Maroons' wonderful Autumn work, for they have downed all rivals, closing the season by beating last year's champions. The Maroons played a steady, machine-like game. Norgren's long punts were important factors, dives into the line by Pierce and Gray clinched scores when end and tackle runs made them possible, and a great run of eighty-two years for a touchdown by Gray, who had intercepted a forward pass, was the spectacular event of the game.

Gray's run turned a possible Wisconsin touchdown into one for the Maroons. The Badgers had the ball on Chicago's twenty-yard line, and with four yards to make in one attack, Quarter Back Bellows tried a pass. Gray leaped in the air and pulled down the oval. Only Bellows stood between him and the Badger goal, and by a long sweeping run he eluded the Cardinal quarter back, outsped Ofstie, and planted the ball behind the posts.

Rain kept the crowd nearly to the seating capacity, extra stands taking care of 2,000 persons. Probably 25,000 spectators were present. Ticket scalpers fought at the last minute to get rid of their pasteboards at cost prices, but many of them suffered losses. The field was slippery, but its cover of hay had kept it from becoming soft and the rain had ceased before the game started.

The first quarter was less than five minutes old when the Maroons pushed over the first touchdown. Norgren's great punts with the wind behind them had advanced the two bouts of Tandberg and Bellows and a brief interchange put the ball in Chicago's possession, a few yards inside the Badgers' territory. A forward pass and a double pass brought the ball ten yards from the Wisconsin goal, but a fumble which gave the oval to the Badgers delayed the score.

Sticking close to the side lines the Maroons pushed Norgren over for the touchdown and the kickout was missed. A thirty-yard run by Bellows started a rally late in the first quarter that nearly put the Badgers over. Buck bored big holes in the Chicago right wing and through it the Wisconsin backs carried the ball to the Maroon ten-yard line. Here holding in the line resulted in the ball being awarded to Chicago, and Norgren drove it sixty yards down the field and out of danger. A series of forward passes, most of which went wrong, were tried by the Maroons next. Three of them failed. The line-up:

Chicago.	Position.	Wisconsin.
Huntington	Right end	Ofstie
Goettler	Right tackle	Butler
Scanlon	Right guard	Fowler
Desjarden	Centre	Powell
Harris	Left guard	Gelein
Schull	Left tackle	Buck
Baumgartner	Left end	Lange
Russell	Quarter back	Bellows
Norgren	Right half	Tormey
Gray	Left half	Cummings
Pierce	Full back	Tandberg

Substitutions—Chicago: Leigh for Huntington, Sparks for Baumgartner, Kennedy for Gray, Baumgartner for Sparks, Gray for Kennedy. Wisconsin: Starnum for Lange, Taylor for Bellows, Bellows for Taylor. Taylor for Cummings.

Touchdowns—Pierce, (2,) Gray, (1.) Goal from touchdown—Huntington. Umpire—Mr. Wrenn, of Harvard. Referee—Mr. Hackett, of West Point. Linesman—Mr. Ensley, of Purdue.

ARMY WINS HARD GAME.

Springfield Presents Strong Defense Against Cadets.

WEST POINT, N. Y., Nov. 22.—The Army completed its home season by defeating Springfield Training School this afternoon by a score of 14 to 7, after a hard-fought game. The Cadets did not flash their full strength today, although a goodly number of the regulars got into the contest for a while. Weyand and Markoe stayed throughout the entire game. Springfield furnished plenty of opposition for the patched up line-up and once or twice looked particularly dangerous.

The Army began scoring early. In the first quarter after carrying the ball close to Springfield's goal posts, Doe's toss to Merrillat was intercepted on the goal line by Shabinger. The latter started across the line, but was thrown back by Merrillat for a safety. A few minutes later after a fine display of offensive strength by the Army, Hobbs was sent through Springfield's line for a touchdown from the six-yard line. Merrillat missed an easy goal.

Woodruff tried a goal from placement on the thirty-yard line in this period, but the attempt was poor. The second quarter was an even thing, but in the third each team scored a touch-down. The Army's came after Merrillat had picked the ball out of the air on a pass from Doe and scampered thirty-five yards to the Springfield five-yard line. Millburn was sent through on the next play, but the punt out was not heeled and there was no goal. Shabinger and Dickens pulled off some pretty forward passes a few minutes later, and before the Army awoke to the fact, the ball rested on their twenty-yard line. A penalty for holding took it right up under the posts, and on a fake forward pass, Shabinger ran around right end for the touch-down and Fountain kicked goal.

Hoge, Doe, and Markoe were the Army stars, while Shabinger, Meyers, and Fountain played best for Springfield. The line-up:

Army.	Positions.	Springfield T. S.
Magkoe	Left end	De Groat
Wynne	Left tackle	Cooper
Meacham	Left guard	Holmes
Waddell	Centre	Pennock
Jones	Right guard	McLean
Weyand	Right tackle	Friedlund
Merrillat	Right end	Dickens
Doe	Quarter back	Shabinger
Milburn	Left half back	Meyers
Hobbs	Right half back	Lorenz
Hoge	Full back	Fountain

Touchdowns—Hobbs, Milburn, Shabinger. Goal from touchdowns—Fountain. Substitutes: Shabinger. Substitutes: Army—Larkin for Wynne, O'Hare for Meacham, Meacham for O'Hare, O'Hare for Meacham, Goodman for Waddell, Waddell for Goodman, Waddell for McEwan, McEwan for Waddell, Britton for Merrillat, Merrillat for Britton, Jouett for Merrillat, Mahoney for Doe, Jouett for Mahoney, Doe for Jouett, Lanphier for Hobbs, Ford for Lanphier, Woodruff for Hoge, Ford for Woodruff, Hoge for Ford, Lanphier for Hoge. Springfield T. S.—Meyers for De Groat, Prichard for Meyers. Referee—J. A. Evans. Umpire—C. J. McCarty. Head linesman—Lieut. Hayes, West Point. Time of quarters—Fifteen minutes each.

Game called on account of darkness after twelve minutes play in fourth quarter.

Bell to Lead Springfield Team.

Walter Bell of Atlantic City, N. J., was elected Captain of the Springfield Y. M. C. A. football team for 1914 at a banquet held by the eleven last night at the Twenty-third Street Y. M. C. A. The banquet marked the close of the 1913 season, which has been one of the most successful in the football history of the Springfield College. During the year nine games were played and seven resulted in victories. The team played West Point at the reservation yesterday and came to this city immediately after the contest to hold the banquet. Speeches were made by Fred Dicken, the 1913 Captain, and other members of the squad.

Bell, the Captain-elect, plays left end on the eleven, and he has been one of the leading players of the team for the past two seasons. He is a member of the class of 1915, is aggressive, a good handler of the forward pass, and has all the qualities which make for successful leadership. He will have the nucleus of a strong team next season, despite the graduation in June of nine of the fifteen players who made the college emblem this year. The six veterans who will be available next Fall will represent enough playing strength for the building up of a winning team.

Minds Out of Cornell Game.

Special to The New York Times.

PHILADELPHIA, Nov. 22.—Chester Minds, whose fall at the Grosse Pointe Country Club, Detroit, prevented his playing against Michigan, has a broken bone in his left shoulder, and he will be unable to play in the game with Cornell here on Thanksgiving Day. Mike Avery will fill the full back post in the final game of the season. Minds wants to play. He wants to wear a shoulder brace, a huge leather pad, and take his chances, but Dr. Hancock has informed him the first knock would send him to the side lines. As Minds does the passing, punting, and piloting of the Pennsylvania team, the coaches think it would be better to school another man who can remain all through the battle, and for this reason they have been rushing Mike Avery to fill Minds's position.

STEVENS EASY FOR RUTGERS'S BIG TEAM

New Brunswick Boys Get Five Touchdowns Against Their Hoboken Rivals.

Rutgers's big football eleven, one of the most powerful scoring machines in the history of the New Brunswick college, completely overwhelmed the light Stevens Institute team in the annual battle between the ancient rivals at Castle Point, Hoboken, yesterday afternoon. Barring a few minutes in the third period, when Stevens rushed the visitors off their feet for a distance of sixty-five yards, the Hoboken boys were almost helpless against their opponents, and the score gives a true line on the relative worth of the two elevens. Rutgers got three touchdowns and a field goal in the first half and two touchdowns in the second, missing another score in the closing minutes of play by a matter of inches when the runner with the ball was checked by one of the uprights of the goal post. A crowd of 5,000 saw the game.

The forward pass, the bane of most college teams, was responsible for most of the scoring. Rutgers had the play down to a science, and it is doubtful if any other Eastern college eleven has employed the play so successfully in any game this year as the New Brunswick students worked it yesterday. Incompleted passes were the exception rather than the rule, and the few which went astray came so close to success that failure did not lessen the brilliancy of the effort. More than a dozen times Rutgers succeeded in passing the ball ahead for gains of from fifteen to twenty yards, and in each of the five touchdowns the pass played a big part. Twing did the passing, with either Talman or Nash on the receiving end, and the manner of execution was varied just enough to keep Stevens guessing all the way.

Talman, the 200-pound full back of the New Brunswick aggregation, was easily the star of the game. His massive frame stood out prominently even on a big team, such as Rutgers has this season, and he was conspicuous in practically all of the plays. He was Rutgers's best ground gainer in the rushing game, but his best man as a gainer was Twing, and he did the bulk of the kicking. Besides scoring five of the six touchdowns, he kicked four goals after touchdowns, and also dropped the ball over the cross-bar from the 35-yard line. Twing, Bracher, and Capt. Elmendorf were other notable performers on the winning side.

Rutgers's path to an easy victory was paved with Stevens's fumbles, the Red and Gray team showing great weakness at holding the ball, though the gridiron and ball were perfectly dry. Seiler did the best work for the Hoboken team, especially after Stevens had taken the lead. Stevens made its only bid for a score. After rushing the ball a distance of sixty-four yards from their own 35-yard line, the Stevens boys were stopped one yard from the Rutgers goal line and the ball went to the visitors on downs.

Rutgers's first chance came within the first five minutes of play. Following Kent's kick-off Rutgers started a march goalward, was halted temporarily and punted. Stevens could do nothing with the Rutgers line and punted back to the 40-yard line from which point Rutgers cut loose and went down the field for a score. The New Brunswick boys finishing up the long journey with three forward passes in succession, the final one being from Twing to Talman for a touchdown. Talman failed to kick the goal. Score: Rutgers, 6; Stevens, 0.

The second touchdown was scored in short order. On the first play after Rutgers had kicked off Musk fumbled at Stevens's 30-yard line, and Rutgers pounded its way to the goal line. Talman did the bulk of line plunging, and Capt. Elmendorf went over the line for the touchdown. Talman kicked the goal and Rutgers led, 13 to 0. Following Talman's kick-off over the goal line Stevens lined up at the 20-yard line but could not gain and Musk punted. Neither team threatened to score during the remainder of the period, and time was called with the ball in Stevens's possession near midfield.

Three minutes after the second period began Talman sent his team farther ahead with a field goal from the 35-yard line. It was a perfectly executed kick, the ball sailing directly between the uprights and only a short distance above the cross bar. Another of Rutgers numerous fumbles paved the way for the big full back from Rutgers to show his versatility. Score: Rutgers, 16; Stevens, 0.

Following the next kick-off Musk, the Stevens quarter back, made another fumble of a long punt by Talman thirty yards from the Stevens goal line. Again the opportunity was eagerly accepted by the New Brunswick boys and a combination of battering tactics with one brilliantly executed forward pass soon brought the ball to within one yard of the goal line. Talman went over for another touchdown and kicked an easy goal, putting Rutgers far ahead. The remainder of the period was featured by two more brilliant passes on the part of Twing and Talman, but no more scoring resulted. Stevens had the ball twice, but each time the Rutgers line held like a stone wall, and the Hoboken boys were forced to punt. Just before time was called Rutgers got the ball on a punt at midfield and again started for a touchdown only to be halted by the whistle. The half ended with Rutgers leading, 23 to 0.

Talman kicked off for Rutgers at the beginning of the second half, and Stevens fumbled, but recovered the ball. The Hoboken backs could not gain, and Musk kicked to midfield. Talman returned the punt on the first line-up, and Musk was thrown almost at the goal line, from behind the line Musk kicked back, and Todd got the ball at Stevens's 30-yard line. This time it was a slow march that Rutgers made for a touchdown, but it was none the less effective. A 15-yard penalty for holding made Rutgers's work a bit harder, but on the second play after the penalty Twing and Nash regained the distance with a forward pass and another touchdown was made on another forward pass, Twing to Talman. Talman also kicked the goal. Score: Rutgers, 30; Stevens, 0.

During the remainder of the third period Stevens showed its finest work of the game. Getting the ball at their 35-yard line after an exchange of punts, the Hoboken boys smashed hole after hole in the Rutgers line and carried the ball to within one yard of touchdown, where two forward passes to assist in the advance. Seiler, the Stevens full back, led in the attack, and the Rutgers line crumpled so fast that substitute line men were rushed from the side lines. The period ended just as Stevens made its final plunge and was held without a gain at Rutgers's one-yard line.

Talman's punt from behind the goal line was the first play of the fourth period. Stevens got the ball at the 40-yard line, but could not gain, and Musk returned the punt. Bracker got the ball on his own 2-yard line and raced up the field for the most spectacular advance of the game. Three times he threw off Stevens tacklers, and soon only Musk loomed up between the runner and the goal line. The little Stevens quarter back timed his lunge perfectly and brought the Rutgers half back to earth after he had traveled sixty yards. On the first play after this long run, Graydon, right end of the Stevens team, injured his ankle and had to be helped from the field. Stevens showed good defensive work at this stage, and forced Rutgers to punt. Todd brought the ball back to the 25-yard line, but Stevens was held for downs, and Rutgers got the ball. Two pretty forward passes gained most of the distance in Rutgers's advance for a touchdown, and again Talman went over for a touchdown, also kicking the goal. Score: Rutgers, 37; Stevens, 0. Another forward pass by Stevens on the second play after the kick-off gave Rutgers the ball at Stevens's 30-yard line, and again came the steady march goalward. This time the goal post interfered on the final plunge, and Rutgers lost the ball on downs within a few inches of another touchdown. The line-up:

Rutgers.	Position.	Stevens.
Rockefeller	Left end	Howell.
Nash	Left tackle	Stretch
McCloskey	Centre	Kent
McCallum	Right guard	Wilson
Talman	Right tackle	Middleton
R. Seiler	Right end	Graydon
Elmendorf	Quarter back	Musk
Todd	Left half back	Stevens
Fracher	Right half back	Hersloff
Talman	Full back	F. Seiler

Touchdowns—Talman, 5; Elmendorf, 1. Goals from touchdowns—Talman, 4. Goal from field—Talman. Substitutions—Martin for Rockefeller, Pfaltz for Twing, Gay for Todd, Wittpenn for Bracher, Bracher for Wittpenn, Savaie for Hersloff. Referee—Mr. Crollius, Dartmouth. Umpire—Mr. Cochems, Wisconsin. Linesman—Mr. Quill, Yale. Time of periods—Fifteen minutes.

Teams Stevens Has Not Played.

Through an error the names of Barringer High School and Middlebury College have been included in the Stevens Technical Institute record in to-day's Special Football Section of THE TIMES. Confusing the Stevens Institute and Stevens Prep teams was somewhat to blame for the error. The Stevens Institute eleven has no high school teams on its schedule, and it did not play Barringer High, neither did the team oppose Middlebury College this season

TRINITY BEATS WESLEYAN.

Deetjen So Carefully Covered That He Couldn't Do Anything for Losers

Special to The New York Times.

HARTFORD, Conn., Nov. 22.—With lots of untaken money at 4 and 3 to 5 against them the remarkable little Trinity football team, led by their big Captain, Ed. Hudson, the plunging full back, went up against Wesleyan here this afternoon in the twenty-sixth annual contest and the last and biggest game for each team, and won decisively, 14 to 0. The score does not indicate the margin of victory as fully as does the racket in town to-night. Three times at least Trinity was deprived of touchdowns when the Wesleyan line held like a steel frame or when the ball was taken for penalties. Trinity lost fifty yards in penalties and Wesleyan only five.

Kinney tried four goals from placement and three of them missed by only a few feet. The chief reason, aside from the sensational and irresistible individual work of Hudson for Trinity's victory was that the team had been coached by Prof. Getchell to smear Deetjen, the Wesleyan quarter back, who has been starring all season. Deetjen did not have a chance. In fact, Wesleyan failed to make first down until the final quarter, when Francis and MacKenzie each made a long run.

The Trinity ends, especially Elder, went after Deetjen and frequently sneaked around and tackled from behind just as he was handed the ball. Kinney at centre worked well with Hudson and ripped some spacious gaps through which Hudson galloped and fought for ten or twelve yard gains. Quarter back Smith made the first touchdown by throwing himself for two feet over the line after Hudson had just failed to score. The second touchdown was by Hudson, when Wooley recovered a blocked kick. Wesleyan's line-up was changed frequently, but Trinity's not. In the second period Smith directed a beautiful pass of fifteen yards to Moore, but the ball was called back for off-side eagerness. On the next line-up the same pass was worked for eighteen yards, and an instant later Hudson's huge form, the ball hugged to his chest, was actually a few inches over the goal line only to be bounced back by the whole concentrated Wesleyan line. The line-up:

Trinity.	Position.	Wesleyan.
Howell	Left tackle	Steeb
Kinney	Centre	Hingely
Lambert	Right guard	Allison
Wooley	Right tackle	Gorman, Wilcox, Kenan
Cole	Right end	E. T. Eustis
Smith	Quarter back	Deetjen
Coffee	Left half back	Kenan, Francis
Moore	Right half back	Mackenzie
Hudson	Full back	E. M. Eustis

VICTORY FOR MINNESOTA.

Illinois Defeated in Game Featured by Open Playing.

CHAMPAIGN, Ill., Nov. 22.—Minnesota won from Illinois to-day, by a score of 19 to 9, in what was probably the most open game ever played in the West. Both teams used the forward pass most of the time, the Gophers early learning that play was their only chance to penetrate to the Orange and Blue defense.

Illinois, after three touchdowns had been scored by the men from the North, came back strong in the last period and rushed the Gophers off their feet, scoring one touchdown and keeping the invaders in hot water the rest of the time. The introduction of Silkman to throw the pass gave Illinoians an effective passer, and it almost seemed that the battling Illinois would catch up with their adversaries.

The Gophers had a set-back early in the first period, when Rowe scored a field goal for Illinois, but in the second period resorted to forward passes and caught the Illinoians by surprise, Shaughnessy's passes to Solon gaining a touchdown.

In the third and early in the fourth period the Gopher propensity to pass had its success in two more scores. Then the tide of battle quickly changed with the introduction of Silkman. The line-up and summary:

Field Goal Wins for Missouri.

COLUMBIA, Mo., Nov. 22.—On a field so muddy that both teams were forced to resort to open play, the Missouri University football team defeated the University of Kansas today 3 to 0. The score was made in the second quarter on a field goal from placement by McWilliams, who booted the ball twenty yards.

"DANNY" MAHER LEADS.

American Jockey Won 115 Races in England This Season.

LONDON, Nov. 22.—The close of the English flat racing season to-day finds "Danny" Maher again at the head of the list of winning jockeys, with a total of 115 firsts. His nearest competitor is Frank Wootton, who won 91 races.

The sums won by owners on the average were small. J. B. Joel, who tops the list, only pocketing $125,000. August Belmont and Harry P. Whitney were both below the $50,000 mark in their winnings.

TO SAIL CUP DEFENDER.

Christiansen Will Be Skipper of Vanderbilt Boat in America's Race.

BRISTOL, R. I., Nov. 22.—Capt. Chris Christiansen of New York will be the skipper of the New America's Cup defender to be built for the Vanderbilt syndicate at the Herreshoff yards here. This announcement was made to-day by Robert W. Emmons, 2d, of Boston, manager of the syndicate.

Capt. Christiansen served as mate on the cup defenders Columbia and Reliance under the Captaincy of the late Charley Barr. Recently he has been sailing master of the sixty-foot sloop Aurora, owned by Cornelius Vanderbilt.

Penn Lads Defeat Cornell Cubs.

Special to The New York Times.

ITHACA, N. Y., Nov. 22.—The Pennsylvania freshmen defeated the Cornell freshmen in their annual game here this afternoon by the score of 13 to 7. The game was loosely played throughout the first half, but the second developed some good football, Pennsylvania won the game by striking hard in the second period, when she scored two touchdowns. Urquhart made the first after a twenty-yard run on a forward pass, and Matthews the second after the Quaker had intercepted a Cornell forward pass on the Ithacans' thirty-yard line and rushed it across on straight football. In the second half Cornell outplayed the Pennsylvania cubs for all the way, they scored a touchdown in the third period on a forward pass to Whitney, and when the whistle blew at the end of the game had the ball on Pennsylvania's ten-yard line. The line-up:

Cornell, 1917.	Position.	Penn., 1917.
Coleman	Left tackle	Ertresbaag
Carter, (C.)	Centre	Boris

Touchdowns—Urquhart, Gotwais, Whitney. Goal from touchdown—Carter and Urquhart. Substitutions—Cornell: De Witt for Coleman, Wern for Munsick, McCormick for Loewe, Quinn for Eckley, Lutz for Quinn, Eckley for Lutz, Pennsylvania: Gevelin for Brennan, Henning for Witherow, Dougherty for Geyelin, Downs for Matthews, Freihofer for Downs, Field for Norwald, Brennan for Dougherty, Dougherty for Freihofer, Hinkson for Dougherty, Geyelin, Hinkson, Dougherty for Matthews. Referee—Mr. Cooper of Princeton. Umpire—Mr. Hinkey of Yale. Head Linesman—Lieut. Bull of Cornell. Time of quarters—Fifteen minutes.

Ohio State Makes Big Score.

COLUMBUS, Ohio, Nov. 22.—Northwestern was overwhelmingly defeated here to-day by Ohio State, the final score being 58 to 0. Outclassed in every department of the game except punting, the Purple team offered little resistance to the machine-like attack of the Scarlet and Grey men. The visitors were able to make but three first downs.

Whitney Is Dartmouth Captain.

HANOVER, N. H., Nov. 22.—Lawrence Whitney, Olympic shot putter and intercollegiate champion in the event, was elected captain of the 1914 Dartmouth football team to-night. Whitney played a star game at left half back during the season just closed and was also a member of the eleven last year.

Hobart Elects Football Captain.

GENEVA, N. Y., Nov. 22.—Kenneth G. Furgason of Lockport, N. Y., was to-day elected captain of next year's Hobart football team. Furgason, although a sophomore, has played a star game for the last two years at full back and quarter back and is one of the best backfield men to represent Hobart in recent years.

JUDGE MOORE TRIUMPHS IN HORSE SHOW---ARMY AND NAVY GAME TO CLOSE FOOTBALL YEAR

HORSE SHOW RECORD FOR MOORE HORSES

New York Exhibitor Sweeps Every Harness Horse Class with Championship and Reserve.

WINS WITH BROKEN LEG

JCapt. Richardson of British Army Carries Off Honors at the Horse Show.

Passing into the archives as the most successful exhibition of the National Horse Show Association since the advent of Alfred G. Vanderbilt as President in 1909, the twenty-ninth annual fixture ended last night in a blaze of glory. The seats and boxes were filled with a fashionable and enthusiastic throng until the awards were made in the last class, and the "clothes walk," as the promenade around the ring has been termed, was at times impassable except by pushing with shoulders and proceeding at a snail's pace.

James R. McGown of Sterling, Ky., owner and breeder of J. Malcomb Forbes, arrived during the day. He said he would not give consideration to the offer of $40,000 from the Russian Government for the stallion, and that $75,000 would not tempt him to part with the horse.

With the advent of the championships in the heavy harness horse division, Judge Moore began an unexampled series of successes, which were fully justified by the victories of his string in the earlier classes. The first, the special cup the gift of Harry Content, of the Long Branch Horse Show Governors, for single harness horse over 14.2 and not exceeding 15.2, was a double victory for Judge Moore, Lord Seaton retaining his title, and Raeburn being reserve. The only other contestants were J. Sumner Draper's Rillington Nimble and Broadlawn Farm's Princess Sheila.

Seven were in the ring for the championship for single harness horses exceeding 12.2 hands, the added trophy the gift of the International Horse Show, London, England, the contestants including Miss Loula Long's Revelation, driven by herself, and Miss E. Viau's Earl Grey. The winner was Bountiful, the bay mare gaining eligibility by only a margin of two inches, Judge Moore driving, and reserve being 16.0½ hands Robinhood, Chipchase on the reins, that went with the style and action of a real clipper, but Bountiful showed her paces with equal facility.

In pairs for championship, not to exceed 15.2, the winners and reserve were once more the entries of Judge Moore with Lord and Lady Seaton, the English couple that also captured the title for him last year, with Chipchase driving the reserve pair, Whitewall Ariel and Raeburn. There were four entries, which included the Ormont Farm's Babette and Bobbinette. The cup was also a presentation from the International Horse Show Association.

This left only the championship for harness pairs over 15.2, in which Judge Moore showed two entries of the grandest big horses of the type ever sent into a show ring by the same owner. The five entries included Miss Loula Long driving her bays Hesitation and Consternation, which made the best showing they have put up during the entire fixture. The cup was the gift of E. T. Stotesbury. The winners were Judge Moore's Robinhood and Wallenstein, with his novice class winners Manfred and Madiline reserve.

To attain the distinction of making a world's horse show record by winning all the harness horse championships and all the reserve ribbons, while merely undertaking the driving and exhibiting of high-stepping nags as a recreation and the pleasure of owning them, Judge Moore has without doubt expended fully $500,000 among the horse dealers and breeders of America and in the incidentals of their trappings, leaving out of the calculations what he spent for stables in town and country, wages, the keep of his string and transportation charges from show to show.

There is no monetary attractions to tempt other amateurs to go in for the horse show pastime on such a vast scale, no Derbys or 50,000 Jubilee Stakes to be won or Ascot gold cups filled with 5,000 guineas in sight. It is safe to say that unless Judge Moore repeats the feat the record will never again be recorded in the New York show ring.

Middleweight qualified hunters, to be tried out over the regular jumps, had possession of the ring after the harness horse championships. It was a contest of proved adepts, and there were no mistakes made, which gave the added value to the winning of the blue ribbon by the Hon. Clifford Sifton's Canadian mare, Sunday Morning, with his hunt club whip, Jack Hamilton, up.

The Pennsylvania entry, Glen Riddle Farm's Willow King, C. Utz riding, was second, next in the line was Lieut. Sifton's Elmhurst, with Hamilton again in the saddle, and fourth ribbon went to the Hart Bros.' Harkaway, ridden by A. E. Hart, the first appearance in the ribbons this year of the pioneers and staunchest upholders of fox hunting on Staten Island and exhibitors of hunters since the first New York show.

To end the show all the hunters were in competition for the championships in their classes. After due trials and deliberations the honors for heavyweight were awarded to Canada. The Hon. Clifford Sifton's Ravello was pronounced the champion, with Capt. W. T. Rodden's Outpost, reserve.

Next followed the consideration of the middleweights, and the judges found it a hard problem to split hairs between the fine hunters brought before them, for, while jumping is determined on a scale of points, comparative value of the essential details of conformation and looks of a horse lies in the eyes of the beholder. The championship was awarded to Glen Riddle Farm's Willow King, with the Sifton entry, Sunday Morning, reserve.

The championship for lightweight hunters, the final award of the 1913 show, was awarded to the Hon. C. Sifton's Cleveland, with A. A. Fowler's Rock Crest, reserve.

The finish of the road race between four-in-hand teams was the feature of the afternoon, and a fanfare on his "yard of tin" by Dave Adams, the guard, as Emil Seelig's team rattled his sealing coach into the ring, J. S. Kehoe driving, was the signal for the band to answer with the strains of "Hail to the Chief." The victory gave the permanent ownership to Emil Seelig, who won the race last year, as the conditions of the cup, given by Ben Riley of the Arrowhead Inn, stipulated it would become the property of the owner to twice win. Morris E. Howlett was the winner of the first race in 1908, A. G. Vanderbilt won with his gray team in 1909, Paul A. Sorg in 1910, and 1910 was a blank year.

The route was Arrowhead Inn down the Depot Lane Serpentine Hill to Riverside Drive extension, south thereon into Broadway at 157th Street, thence south to 155th Street, east thereon to St. Nicholas Avenue, south to 116th Street, and by way of Seventh Avenue to and into Central Park, following the East Drive to the plaza and thence by way of Fifth Avenue to Twenty-seventh Street and into Madison Square Garden.

Mr. Seelig's team made the run, a distance of nine and one-half miles, in 36¼ minutes, a record. His competitor, Harry Graham, driving for C. B. Taylor, arrived at the Garden twenty minutes later. On other occasions rain and snow have interfered with the going, but this time the weather conditions were perfect, and the course, with the exception of a few blocks on St. Nicholas Avenue, where the asphalt had been newly sprinkled, was in good condition for driving at speed.

In the special class for hunters, which were required to ride over an "in and out," stop, turn back, and ride in again, but taking the side bars to get out; next to ride up to a post and rail fence, and without dismounting to remove the top rail and jump the remaining bars, the rivalry was exciting between thirteen candidates. The spirited riding of Capt. R. M. Stewart Richardson of England, who was handicapped by having to ride with one foot out of the stirrup as a result of his accident which resulted in a broken leg earlier in the week, brought out repeated applause and cheers from the onlookers. He made the best showing of all and the blue ribbon was awarded to his brown gelding Clonsilla; the Hon. Clifford Sifton's Cleveland took the second ribbon, A. A. Fowler's Rock Cress was third, and Sifton's Sunday Morning fourth.

In the afternoon class for harness pairs Judge Moore and Miss Loula Long were the contenders of the seven entries, both showing to spider phaetons while the other pairs were hitched to mail phaetons, more impressive in looks but a heavier vehicle to whirl about on the short turns of the tanbark oval. The Moore entry, Lord Seaton and Lady Seaton, won in an outstanding fashion, although Miss Long's Expectation and Hesitation put up a splendid showing and lost only on quality. The Moore second string, Robinhood and Wallenstein, George Chipchase driving, were in luck to be placed over the entry of Miss E. Viau, of Montreal, in Wonder and Eye Opener and the Boston entry, J. Sumner Draper's Rillington Nimble and Nimbus.

Five splendidly stepping hackney ponies appeared for the championship of that type in single, the cup given by E. Van Der Horst Kock being added to the title. The contenders thoroughbred were Flames, the pony Alfred G. Vanderbilt bought from "Mel Valley" Foster, for a reported price of $10,000 after it had won last year at the Garden, and Masterpiece, also a Mel Valley bred pony that figured on the lead with Master Ben in the team brought out by Miss Bowen of Greenwich three years ago and now owned by Col. MacLean of Montreal, who won with that pair this Spring at the Olympia, London, show. Both made a splendid showing, but Masterpiece skipped on the turns and when straightened out lacked the steadiness of the Oaklands Farm entry. Masterpiece won, however, and administered to Flames the only defeat at New York of his career.

ENGLISH SOCCER RESULTS.

Blackburn Rovers Increase Their Lead in First Division.

LONDON, Nov. 22.—Blackburn Rovers increased their lead in the first division of English association football by a fine win over Sheffield Wednesday at Blackburn, 3-2, as Manchester United, having to journey to Sheffield, went down before Sheffield United by 2-0. Fifty thousand people assembled at Tottenham to see the Hotspurs play Everton, and they were rewarded by seeing a splendid game. Tottenham were in great form and ran out winners by 4-1. West Brownwick Albion did very well to share the points with Sunderland away from home as the latter have one of the strongest teams in the country. The scores:

Sheffield United, 2; Manchester United, 0. Oldham Athletic, 2; Derby County, 1. Manchester City, 2; Chelsea, 1. Bradford City, 5; Bolton Wanderers, 1. Blackburn Rovers, 3; Sheffield Wednesday, 2. Sunderland, 0; West Bromwich Albion, 0. Liverpool, 0; Newcastle United, 1. Aston Villa, 3; Preston North End, 1. Middlesborough, 2; Burnley, 1. Tottenham Hotspur, 4; Everton, 1.

Notts County had a stiff task to face in the second division, finding Hull City in fine form at Hull and lost a hard game by 2 to 0. Although still holding the lead in the table, they are being pressed very hard by Bradford, who further strengthened their position with a splendid win over Barnsley on the latter's grounds by 2 to 1. Woolwich Arsenal beat Birmingham at Highbridge by 1 to 0 before a large crowd, and now occupy third place. Fulham entertained Grimsby Town and after a close game drew 2 to 2. The scores:

Huddersfield 2, Grosoop 1; Lincoln City 0, Clapton Orient 0; Blackpool 2, Leeds City 2; Notts Forest 1, Leicester Fosse 0; Woolwich Arsenal 1, Birmingham 0; Wolverhampton W. 2, Leicester Fosse 1; Hull City 2, Notts County 0; Bradford 2, Barnsley 1; Fulham 2, Grimsby Town 2. Bury and Stockport game postponed owing to bad light.

Swindon Town were at home to Brighton and Hove in their Southern League fixture and a creditable game ended in a draw to 1. Southend United again did well, journeying to Bristol and sharing the points with the Rovers. They have crept into seventh place in the table. Watford and Portsmouth, playing away from home at Southampton and Cardiff, respectively, both gave a splendid account of themselves and won by the same score, 3 to 1. The scores:

West Ham United 3, Gillingham 1; Bristol Rovers 2, Southend United 1. Merthyr Town 2, Northampton 2; Reading 1, Coventry City 0; Watford 3, Southampton 1; Plymouth Argyle 2, Norwich City 0; Exeter City 3, Milwall 1; Queens Park Rangers 3, Crystal Palace 1; Swindon Town 1, Brighton and Hove 1; Portsmouth 3, Cardiff City 1.

COLUMBIA ELEVEN LOSES

But Shows Improvement in Soccer Against Crescent.

Showing the benefits derived from regular coaching by an expert for the past two weeks, Columbia's soccer players made a fine display against the Crescent Athletic Club eleven in the Field Club League championship game at South Field yesterday afternoon, but nevertheless went down to defeat. The Crescents won by 3 goals to 0, but allowed a number of openings, of which the collegians failed to avail themselves. The members of the Crescent forward line, were so many live wires and the sizzling shots they sent in kept goalkeeper Krefeld busy throughout a hotly contested game. Frank Davies, Columbia's new coach was referee of the game and he was in good position to appreciate the work of his charges. What he saw fully satisfied him and he predicted that another month's hard work would fit the Blue and White for the intercollegiate serhies. The line-up:

Columbia.	Position.	Crescent.
Krefeld	Goal	De Baum
Hamilton	Right back	Bodwell
Laguardia	Left back	Charlwood
Romeo	Right half	Watson
Mason	Centre half	Armstrong
Schwarz	Left half	Humphreys
Collingwood	Outside right	Fort
Peck	Inside right	Taylor
Colquhoun	Centre	Jeffers

Goals—Stuart, Fort, (2.) Referee—F. Davies. Linesmen—Messrs. Jamieson and Smith. Time of halves—Forty minutes.

By defeating the Bensonhurst eleven on the Public Schools Athletic League grounds in Brooklyn yesterday afternoon the Central Y. M. C. A. eleven maintained its lead in the Field Club Junior League annual championship series, the final score being 3 goals to 1. Had it not been for the fine work of Fagen and Muir, the Bensonhurst backs, the Central forwards would have got through often. Crawford, with a long shot, was the first to score for the winners, and Boulton made it 2 to 0 before the end of the first half. After the restart Macphee tallied for Bensonhurst, the third goal for the Centrals was shot by Waters.

At Macomb's Dam Park yesterday Morris High scored a victory in the high school championship league at the expense of the Boys' High of Brooklyn, the final score being 2 goals to 1. Both sides missed penalty kicks.

Staten Island's champion soccer team engaged the eleven of the Montclair A. C. on the grounds of the Staten Island Cricket and Tennis Club at Livingston yesterday afternoon, winning out by the score of 4 goals to 0.

At Marquette Oval in Brooklyn yesterday, the unbeaten soccer team from the steamship Vestris met defeat by the Brooklyn Football Club by the score of 4 goals to 2.

Playing a sturdy uphill game and overcoming a lead established by their opponents in the first half, the soccer players of the Manual Training High School of Brooklyn, leading in the high school league series, defeated Stuyvesant at Prospect Park yesterday afternoon by the score of 2 goals to 1.

A close soccer match between Commerce and De Witt Clinton at Van Cortlandt Park yesterday afternoon resulted in favor of Commerce by the score of 1 goal to 0.

GREAT ARMY-NAVY BATTLE COMES NEXT

42,000 People Will View Military Football Spectacle at Polo Grounds.

Not since West Point and Annapolis sent their first football elevens to the field of battle in 1890 has any game between these two institutions been looked forward to with such eagerness by cadets and middies, and the football world in general, as that which is to be played next Saturday at the Polo Grounds. Besides being football's grand finale and the climax of the outdoor sporting season, the contest ranks as the biggest sporting event of the year. As regards the notables who gather to see it played, the Army-Navy football game annually eclipses anything the sporting world has to offer. And this year the event promises to be bigger than ever before.

For the last fourteen seasons, or since football relations were resumed between West Point and Anapolis in 1899, Franklin Field, the playing field of the University of Pennsylvania athletic teams, has been the scene of this annual contest between the two elevens. This year the New York Baseball Club answered the growing need of more spacious stands and the game comes here. Franklin Field accommodated a crowd of approximately 28,000 people and with two branches of the service growing each year a change became necessary. By furnishing 10,000 more seats for the free use of the Army and Navy associations and their friends, coupled with a guarantee of $62,000 for the Army Hospital Fund, with a similar amount for the Navy Fund, the New York club officials persuaded the authorities to decide upon New York as the battleground. It is the biggest football event ever staged in this city.

Seventeen times since 1890 the cadets and middies have striven for fame and glory on the gridiron, and the Navy, by reason of its spectacular successes of the past few years, has gained the greater portion of both. The count now stands nine victories for the Navy and seven for the Army, with only one game a tie. The first game was played at West Point in 1890. Tradition has it that there were only two cadets at the Military Academy that year who had ever played in a game of football, but these two got busy, and in a few weeks they formed a team. The uniforms worn by the players were made by the officers' wives at the reservation, according to the story, and everything pertaining to the game was quite as crude. The Navy won by 24 to 0, and neither the victory nor the size of the score occasioned any surprise among the few who were interested in the outcome. This was the lowly beginning of the series of battles which now hold the blue ribbon as the competitive sport.

In 1891 West Point went into football on the same plan as the large colleges and universities, playing several preliminary engagements before its "big" game against the Navy. A Yale coach, Williams, took charge of the team, and he whipped it into such shape in one season that it completely overwhelmed the middies, the score being 32 to 16. In the following year the Navy Auxiliary Association was formed, with Col. Robert M. Thompson of New York as President. Competent coaches and trainers were secured, and the team which represented the Navy at West Point in the 1892 game was victorious by the score of 12 to 4. It was a case of one recognizing and following the progressive ideas of the other, and in the following year the United States Military Academy Athletic Association and the Army Athletic Association were formed. Funds were raised to promote games with the larger colleges, and "Laurie" Bliss of Yale took charge of the cadets. The two institutions had now reached an excellent mark in football training and equipment, and the annual games of 1893 resulted 6 to 4 in favor of the Navy.

These four battles formed the real beginning of the big event of to-day. Upon the recommendation of the Superintendent of the Military Academy the games were discontinued after the contest of 1893, although both cadets and middies yearned to have the games resumed the rival elevens did not get together again until 1899. Each had a team in the field during the five years and some of them were high-class elevens. But the official edict prevented them from getting together. In 1899 football relationship between the two schools was renewed and has continued ever since on the most friendly terms. There has been but one break since 1899 in the list of annual struggles, that being in 1909, when the Army team disbanded after the accident in the game against Harvard which resulted in the death of Cadet Byrne.

Dr. J. William White of the University of Pennsylvania was largely instrumental in getting the teams together. He offered Franklin Field free to the rival institutions for the big game, and at that time this was considered the best football field in the country. Besides being a neutral field, it was easy of access for the students of both schools and the generous offer was quickly accepted. There was considerable sentiment against giving up Franklin Field this year, but necessity triumphed over sentiment and New York is the gainer thereby. In 1905 the game was played at Princeton, this being tore of a half-way point to travel for the cadets and middies, but the plan proved service, due to the branch line from Princeton Junction, caused a return to Franklin Field after that one experiment.

Football of recent years has furnished no more closely contested struggle than that between the Army and Navy elevens. Regardless of the showing of the teams in the preliminary games of the schedule the two elevens seem to reach an equality in this struggle and a turn in luck costs victory for one and defeat for the other. West Point twice within the last three seasons, has conquered Yale and then failed to score on Annapolis. The Navy has shown one of the greatest football machines of the season for rolling up points, only to go against West Point and fail to push the ball over the goal line. These teams have displayed all kinds of football against other opponents but in the last few years, when battling against each other, they play great football all the way.

It was back in 1907 that the Navy last pushed the ball over the West Point goal line for a touchdown. In that game Captain Ben Douglass had the honor which has fallen to no middie in the four games which have since taken place. The following year Dean of the Army carried the ball over the Navy line and kicked a goal, this touchdown deciding the game as Douglass touchdown had decided the game of the previous year. No cadet has been able in the three games since Dean's performance to plant the pigskin behind that final chalk line. In the five games played since 1906 the Navy has one touchdown to its credit and the Army has no more. But in those three years that lack touchdowns the Navy has been able to show two trusty kickers and their toes are responsible for the edge which Annapolis has on West Point in the games played to date.

In 1908 the Navy gave the Army a scare with a field goal by Lange, but the Cadets won, 6 to 4, the field goal counting four points at that time. In 1910 Dalton kicked a goal from the 30-yard line that gave Annapolis the victory, 3 to 0, and tied the rivals on seven victories each. History repeated itself in 1911, Dalton kicking another field goal from the same line and over the same goal posts. Navy won again, 3 to 0, and went ahead of the Army with eight victories against seven. In last year's game Brown accomplished what Dalton had spread through two games, getting two field goals, which gave the Navy their third successive victory. Neither goal line was crossed in any of the last three games.

The Navy has earned a series of successes such as West Point enjoyed after relations were resumed in 1899. Of the first six games played at Franklin Field the Army won five, generally by one-sided scores, and the one defeat was by the score of 11 to 7 in 1906. Since the one-year change to Princeton in 1905 the Army has had little success. Following the 6—6 tie in 1905 at Princeton, the Army has played six games against the Navy and won only one, the 1908 game, by the score of 6 to 4. This was the only game in which the Army has scored a point since the battle at Princeton. For several years both institutions have been favored with high-class coaching and training, and there is no reason why one should shine so consistently over the other. At West Point there is a feeling that a break is due—that this is an "Army year."

Both elevens have made impressive records this season, the first time in many years that neither of the schools included one of the big college elevens on its schedule. No team appears on the schedule of both teams for furnishing some comparison in scores, but comparative scores never run true in football. They mean nothing. Annapolis has won all its games with little trouble, while West Point has had a busy time with Colgate and Tufts and was overwhelmed by Notre Dame. Notre Dame also defeated Penn State, which is numbered among the victims of the Navy team. The weariness of both cadets and middies, coupled with the limited student body, caused the change in the policy of playing big elevens.

The Navy will have the north side of the stands at Saturday's game and the Army will have the south side. The end sections, or that part of the big stands behind and that includes that section of the bleachers behind centre field, will be allotted to the general public fortunate enough to secure tickets. The gridiron runs east and west, and every seat affords a good view of the play. It is estimated that 42,000 persons will be present when play begins. W. C. Langford of Trinity will referee, Al Sharpe of Yale will umpire, and Carl Marshall of Harvard will be linesman.

Following are the figures of previous games, and this season's records:

ANOTHER FOR CARLISLE.

Indians Show Strong Attack and Weak Defense Against Syracuse.

Special to The New York Times.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., Nov. 22.—Completely outrushing their opponents but losing opportunities to score because of fumbles, the Syracuse University football team went down to defeat at the hands of the Carlisle Indians here this afternoon, 35 to 27. The score shows how keenly the rival elevens fought. Syracuse held Carlisle for downs three times during the fray, but never were the Indians able to stop the progress of the Orange. Only rarely did they forcs a punt, while Syracuse forced Guyon to boot the pigskin on several occasions. The only consistent gaining by the Indians was done by Guyon. The big fellow tore gaps in the Orange line for gains of from three to twelve yards while the ball was near midfield. Carlisle gained by runs around the end, but they did not attempt a forward pass. During the second period Syracuse took the ball to the Carlisle 2-yard line for a first down. On the opening play a double pass was attempted, but the ball went wild. Syracuse recovered on the 15-yard line, but the opportunity for scoring was lost.

Syracuse was the first to score, a run of sixty yards by Castle putting the ball over the line shortly after the first kickoff. Carlisle came right back to even up the count after a heavy charge down the gridiron. Syracuse held for three downs on their own half-yard line, but Guyon put all his strength into the final charge and put the ball just on the goal line. Two of the other touchdowns were scored in the same manner, Syracuse failing to hold for the short gains at the crucial moment.

During the few minutes of play Syracuse gave a brilliant exhibition of aerial football. Every forward pass attempted made good. With the ball on the Carlisle 8-yard line, time was called. The Syracuse team showed far greater offensive power to-day than at any previous time this season. The line-up:

Syracuse.	Position.	Carlisle.
Robbins	Left end	Wallette
White	Left tackle	Welmas
Smithson	Left guard	Hill
Shufelt	Centre	Garlow
Trigg	Right guard	Busch
Propst	Right tackle	Lookaround
Travis	Right end	Pratt
Johnson	Quarter back	Welch
Castle	Left half back	Guyon
Brackliin	Right half back	Kingsley
Calac	Full back	Rose

Score—Carlisle, 35; Syracuse, 27. Touchdowns—Castle, Kingsley, Johnson, 2; Guyon, 2; Calac, Bracklin, Welch. Goals from touchdowns—Garlow, 5; Castle, 3. Substitutions—Farber for Robbins, Rankin for Smith, Woodruff for Castle, Armstrong for Smithson, Smithson for Armstrong, Hamilton for Farber, Vaternack for Wallette, Larvie for Guyon, Grant for Calac, Morrin for Hill. Referee—Mr. Pendleton, Bowdoin. Umpire—Mr. Wright, Columbia. Head linesman—W. W. Roper, Princeton. Time of periods—Fifteen minutes.

Basket Ball Opening at Brooklyn Marred by Rough Work.

The New York University basket ball team opened its season last night with a victory over the Pratt Institute quintet of Brooklyn in the latter's gymnasium by the score of 25 to 18. It was also the first contest of the season for Pratt, and the playing throughout was decidedly rough, four men—the maximum number—being expelled before the end of the game for continual fouling. The New York University players were the principal offenders in fouling, thirty-one fouls being called against them, most of which were committed in the second half.

The first half of the game was closely contested and ended with the score a tie at 9 points, but the twenty minutes of play was marred by the continual foul work of the Pratt Institute representatives. The N. Y. U. players indulged in little foul work in this period, but in the second half the New York team did the bulk of the fouling, Tyler, who played left forward for the N. Y. U. aggregation, made a spectacular goal in this half when the teams were dead-locked at 17 points, and from then until the finish New York held the lead. Tyler's all around playing was the feature of the game, while the accuracy displayed by Welles, the Pratt Institute left forward, in caging goals from foul, stood out prominently. He tallied ten, while Tyler, who handled the majority of foul tries for N. Y. U., caged only six. The line-up:

N. Y. U.	Position.	Pratt.
Levy	Right forward	A. Edwards
Tyler	Left forward	Welles
White	Centre	Church
Cummings	Right guard	Johnson
Kearney	Left guard	Harmon

Goals from field—Levy, (2,) Tyler, (3,) Cummings, (3,) Phillips, A. Edwards, Welles, Johnson, Kavanaugh. Goals from foul—Tyler, (6,) Welles, (10.) Substitutions: For N. Y. U.—Phillips for Cummings, B. Edwards for Kearney. For Pratt—Woodward for Johnson, Kavanaugh for Harmon. Referee—J. A. O'Shea, St. John's College. Time of halves—Twenty minutes.

WILLIAMSTOWN, Mass., Nov. 22.—A 2 to 2 tie resulted in the Williams College undergraduate soccer contest of the season, played on Weston Field this afternoon.

ATTACK PRINCETON COACHING SYSTEM

Students and Alumni Favor a Resident Coach for Term of Years.

Special to The New York Times.

PRINCETON, N. J., Nov. 22.—A general spirit of doubt as to the efficacy of the football coaching policy now being pursued at Princeton has become evident among some of the undergraduates, and some alumni as well, since the failure of the Tiger eleven to defeat Yale last Saturday at New Haven. It is not a new thing—the trouble has been brewing for three years—and seems to be coming to a head. The criticism so far has left plenty of room for arguments on the side of the present system, and in view of the enunciation three weeks ago by the Board of Athletic Control to the effect that all marks of professional coaching were to be eventually discarded by a gradual process, makes it difficult to see just how the management can escape from their present system unless they compromise their anti-professional spirit.

In spite of this idealistic endeavor the students seem to be more interested in getting a Princeton team which can bring home the victories, even though it does require a resident coach such as Harvard and Yale now employ. It is acknowledged by even the most ardent opponents of the existing scheme that Princeton has done well against bigger teams—but in the same breath it is claimed that the "well" could be made better.

The points of criticism are numerous. First of all, it is argued that the present scheme of changing coaches often introduces a necessary discontinuity into the training of the teams from year to year, and that the constant changes make it impossible for one coach to profit as well as he might by the experiences of the men previously in charge. In addition the changes necessitate a change in the relationship between the coaches and the players, two-thirds of whom on the average are out for the teams for three years. The knowledge of the peculiarities of the players learned by one coach have to relearned by the next coach, and the same thing is true of the players in respect to the coaches. The general playing policy also shifts. One coach insists upon one style of play, gets the men used to it, and the following year a change may bring entirely different coach, with a correspondingly different style of play, which has to be learned over by the men, introducing naturally a comparative greenness at the game until late in the season. The criticism is entirely at the system, not at any of the coaches as individuals. When the kickers are disgruntled at is the fact that the policy ruins what might be a means of turning out winning elevens.

Why it is that coachcs are not kept from year to year—two years is the longest that a coach has stayed on the field—is not known. It is thought that the salary offered the coach to take three months away from his business and spend it down here is not sufficiently attractive to entice the best men to do it year after year.

Aside from the comment on the system of selecting coaches the critics find fault with the policy which has been in force for several years and which, it is claimed by some, has been partly the cause of Princeton falling to win against Yale and Harvard. One flaw is that the Tigers never show any wonderful, well-organized offensive style of play. As a rule the attack is built around one or two individual star players and the rest then marked men to the other team and who are soon crimped in so far as scoring against Yale and Harvard are concerned. Captain Baker of the 1913 team and "Tol" Pendleton of the 1912 eleven are examples of this. Neither one could be what was expected in the big games because they could not get away from the double watch put upon them. Even in the 1911 championship eleven it was the individual brilliancy of "Sam" White which actually tallied the scores rather than the concerted attack of the eleven.

The Princeton elevens usually play the game "safe," even to the extent of running the danger of losing the game. In the Yale-Princeton contest in 1912, when the score was 6 to 3 in Princeton's favor, the Tigers resorted to a defensive game entirely, and the result was that Yale scored three more points and fought hard with the narrow lead which the Tigers were holding. The lay student does not avidly seize the logic of the waiting game when the team for which he is rooting has only a three-point lead.

The lack of a final punch to take the ball across the goal line is to be attributed, the critics say, to the general policy of building the attack about one or two men instead of making the whole team responsible for the score. What many men complain of is that the Tigers spend weeks in secret developing an "open game," and it works with unusual success against the scrub and the other opposition, but as soon as the days of the big games come this "open game" is tucked away and the Tigers don their old-time defensive style of football. The logic which the disgruntled cannot see is where the coaches gain anything by teaching the team two departments of the game and only letting them use one.

It was known commonly in Princeton this fall that the Tigers had a much more open game than they showed against Yale and Harvard, although the wet and slippery field on which the Harvard game was played did afford some excuse for not trying the danger of the plays which depended upon absolutely clean handling of the ball. For instance, the Tigers had spent a great deal more time on their forward passes and did have good success with them in practice, but against Yale the attack was completely abandoned when the early attempts failed. The policy was to kick and kick and kick, which was following the lead of the opponents instead of striking out aggressively on their own attack.

The coaches are unanimous in favor of the present system of coaching at Princeton, but the students do not feel the enthusiasm for it which the coachcs evince.

Irving Blanks Poly Prep.

Poly Prep fell a victim to the strong and well-balanced football eleven of Irving High School yesterday afternoon in a game played at Irving by the score of 27 to 14. Anderson proved the star of the Irving School, with several telling gains around end through the Poly line. Irving scored in every period. Du Tremblay prevented his school from being shut out by scoring the two touchdowns, and he kicked both goals. The line-up

Irving.	Position.	Poly Prep.
Murray	Left end	Thompson
Parish	Left tackle	Sutton
Norris	Centre	Parsons
Allen	Right guard	Redmond
Conley	Right tackle	Bronder
Holden	Right end	Quinn
Leaf	Quarter back	Du Tremblay
Payne	Left half back	Ryder
Georgi	Right half back	Orrell
Anderson	Full back	Shields

Substitutions—Caffrey for Thompson, Thompson for Ryder, Meenan for Orrell, Herdenbrook for Shields. Touchdowns—Pendleton, Meenan, Conley, Georgi, Anderson, (2.) Goals from touchdowns—Du Tremblay, (2.) Anderson, (2.) Referee—Strathmore, Manhattan. Umpire—Col. Colter, Brown. Head linesman—Mr. Turnbull, Poly Prep. Time of quarters—Eight and ten minutes.

Notre Dame Wins Again.

ST. LOUIS, Nov. 22.—Crumbling in the final quarters this afternoon, the Christian Brothers' College eleven went down in defeat before the Notre Dame team, 20 to 7. It was the Purple and Gold's first defeat in two years. The game started with a series of line plunges, and after ten minutes of play Radican, the local half back, recovered a fumble and scored the "Brethere" touchdown after a run of 25 yards. He kicked goal. Neither team had the advantage in the second period, but in the third quarter Eichenlaub went over for a touchdown on a series of end runs and fake plays. Dorias kicked the goal. In the final period the weight of the visitors showed to advantage. Notre Dame bowling over their lighter opponents with ease. In this quarter Dorias went over for touchdowns on runs of 40 yards. He kicked and missed a goal.

STONE'S DROP KICK WINS.

Morris Half Back Saves Team from Defeat in Closing Minutes of Play.

Morris High School's football eleven pulled the game with Stuyvesant out of the fire yesterday afternoon in the last three minutes of play and came off the field victors by a score of 9 to 7. A large crowd of schoolboy football fans crowded Manhattan Field for the contest and saw Morris qualify further as possible contenders for the football supremacy among the local schools. When all hops seemed to have faded away, Stone, Morris's right half back, came to the front and booted the pigskin over the bars.

In spite of the fact that the game was an exciting schoolboy struggle from start to finish, the playing was in many spots ragged and uncertain. Many penalties were inflicted on both teams for holding, pushing, and offside play, and fumbles at costly moments were common on both sides. The strength of the Morris team lay in her back field. Erwig, the star half back, showed up strongly in end runs and in several instances managed to reel off thirty and thirty-five yards at a clip through a scattered field. Both teams relied in great part on the punting of Schuck and Guggenvig, and in this department of the contest Schuck, the Stuyvesant Captain, showed up to better advantage.

Erwig scored for Morris in the first period after recovering a fumbled ball at Stuyvesant's fifteen-yard line. No goal was kicked. Schuck scored for Sutyvesant in this period after Morris had been held for downs at their own fifteen-yard line. Schuck also kicked the goal. This ended the scoring until Stone won the game with his field goal. The line-up:

Morris.	Position.	Stuyvesant.
Ellis	Left guard	Sinclair
Treanor	Centre	Vollmer
Sherwin	Right guard	Starkey
Huggenvig	Right tackle	La Monaca
Weinheimer	Right end	Kern
Manly	Quarter back	McGuinness
Stone	Right half back	Dillon
Sokolower	Full back	Schuck

Touchdowns—Erwig, Schuck. Goal from touchdown—Schuck. Field goal—Stone. Substitutes—For Morris: Appel for Graeb, Jansen for Sherwin, Pults for Jansen, Sherwin for Pults. For Stuyvesant: Hogan for Dillon, Dillon for Hammerschlag, Lurch for Kern. Referee—L. Fitzpatrick, Fordham. Umpire—J. Wheeler, N. Y. U. Head linesman—D. Crawford, N. Y. U. Time of periods—Twelve and one-half minutes.

New York M. A. Defeats Commerce.

Special to The New York Times.

CORNWALL-ON-HUDSON, N. Y., Nov. 22.—The New York Military Academy closed its football season to-day without having lost a scholastic game, by beating the High School of Commerce by a score of 21 to 12 in a hard-fought game full of trick plays and hammer-and-tonge work in the line. Commerce had a heavy and aggressive line, which threw back the attack of the cadets until the fourth quarter, when New York M. A. found open holes, which led to good gains. Quinn of Commerce made two touchdowns following long runs from the kick-offs on trick plays, but failed to kick either goal. Naylor made two touchdowns and Davis one for New York M. A., and Davis kicked three goals. Naylor made one run of sixty yards for a touchdown through a broken field. This, for the second year in succession, given the New Yorkers, has clearly crippled their weakened elovy but surely before the fierce attacks of the Purdue line and the wonderful interference of Coach Smith's pupils. The game was the last for Indiana under the leadership of Jimmie Sheldon, who three weeks ago announced his resignation as coach. The line-up:

Purdue.	Position.	Indiana.
Stinchfield	Left end	B. Whitaker
Blocker	Left tackle	Winters
Burns	Left guard	Walker
Bishop	Centre	Bean
Routh	Right guard	Conrad
Usener	Right tackle	Worsey
Wintermute	Right end	Krause
Finn	Quarter back	Fleming
Glossup	Left half back	F. Whitaker
O'Brien	Right half back	Ershart
Oliphant	Full back	Scott

Referee—Mr. Siler of Illinois. Umpire—Mr. Haynes of Yale. Head Linesman—Mr. Hammond of Michigan. Time of periods—Fifteen minutes.

Touchdowns—O'Brien, (2,) Stinchfield, Oliphant, Ussner, Finn, B. Whitaker. Goals from touchdown—Oli

GIANTS AND WHITE SOX ON WORLD'S TOUR---ATHLETICS---BOXING---GOLF---OTHER SPORTS

AROUND WORLD WITH THE GIANTS

Manager McGraw Writes of the Last Days of the American Tour.

BY JOHN J. McGRAW,
Manager of the Giants.

Special Correspondence of THE NEW YORK TIMES.

SEATTLE, Wash., Nov. 19.—We are now on the brink of our real long trip, and by the time that this letter is published a lot of the athletes will have found out the answer to a question which has been bothering them all the way across the continent. The question is:

"Do I get seasick?"

Matty had already had past experience and took no chance, quitting the party in Tacoma. It was the water that scared the big fellow off the trip. We kept after him up to the very end, but he declined. It was a great disappointment to me that he would not come along.

"No, nothing doing, 'Mac,'" he said. "I can't even stand the idea, not alone the reality, and you know I have tried it."

The last week in the West was one of the busiest of the tour, and we have been banqueting and going to the theatres and sightseeing and playing ball all the time. Of course, we had to sandwich some travel in between, but the jumps in California were not so long, and most of the boys feel very well rested now, and all are enthusiastic over the trip. We leave with each team having won fifteen games and with one game a tie. Several of the boys have made bets on the outcome of the series from this point in our travels to the end, but the total quantity of money was down on the outcome of the complete set of games to be played all the way around, so that you can figure for yourself there will be no lagging on this trip when it comes to playing baseball.

It was a big disappointment to me that the game in Seattle had to be called off because if that had taken place we could have completed thirty-three contests in thirty-three days since leaving Cincinnati, which would be a considerable record. As it was, we have lost only three scheduled games on the trip so far, and we made up for two of these days with double headers.

The financial results of the journey to date have been particularly flattering, as the crowds have turned out well all along the route, but especially in the coast towns, where we have been for the last ten days. Our proceeds from the games played to the coast amounted to more than $97,000. I would have been satisfied with $60,000.

There were several stories printed in the newspapers about my trouble with Klem while we were in San Francisco. Part of that fuss was on the level and part was stage stuff. You see, all the fans out in this neck of the woods are crazy about the Big Leagues. Donlin and I framed it up that we would give them a taste of a real kick on a play. The moving picture rights to our act would have been worth money. We were in a good state of mind to kick anyway after the hard traveling and the many banquets and the constant handshaking. My nerves were jangling a little bit. So after Klem pulled some close ones against us, I went up to him and muttered things around him and blew myself to a good, old-fashioned, complaining bee.

Then Donlin came in and started to collaborate. Klem played his part perfectly without any rehearsal. I guess maybe all the travelling had got to both of us, because we fired us both right out of the game without pausing a minute to consider. It tickled the fans to death, and they hollered for more.

And speaking of handshaking, I don't think I would ever care for a political job if that is part of the regular work. I doubt if I will ever be able to use my right hand again. It has been wrung almost to a pulp during the journey from Cincinnati to the Coast. And most of the boys feel the same way. Matty, of course, came in for the lion's share of handshakes. In every small town at which the train stopped for a few minutes there were crowds at the stations yelling for Matty. Everybody knows that Big Six is bashful, and he would generally refuse to go out on the platform. But "Germany" Schaefer would not overlook any such opportunity. He was little Johnny-right-out-on-the-platform, and, of course, the crowd, not knowing Matty except from his pictures, thinking Schaefer was Big Six, would set up a howl.

"Oh, you, Matty! Yea, Matty! How are you, Big Six?"

Then the inimitable Schaefer would spread his hands for silence.

"Ladies and Gentlemen," he would begin, "I see here before me the flower of the society in this town, and I don't see how such grand specimens could be raised in this cold climate except in a conservatory. (Cheers.) I want to compliment you on your wonderful health and beauty giving climate, on your pretty girls, your beautiful women and your well-paved streets."

As a rule, the streets would be ankle deep in mud. But "Germany" always got the big hand and left a trail of oratory clear across the continent to Matty's credit. I'll bet William J. Bryan has nothing on Big Six's reputation as a speaker in the towns both Mr. Bryan and Schaefer have played. Of course, this was only possible in the smaller centres where the big pitcher was not well known.

Next, a yell would go up for Mr. Comiskey, who did not join the party until about a week ago. But this made no difference. Harry Sparrow, the business manager of the tourists, would go to the observation platform, and the crowd would cheer Comiskey. Mr. Sparrow has had various experience and knew how to put it over. He also has a convincing and pompous personality. He did not leave any poorer reputation for Mr. Comiskey than Schaefer did for Matheweon as an orator, and both were well taken care of.

Taking it all in all, it was a very pleasant journey across the continent, and it did not seem altogether like traveling with a ball club. The women in the party made things different, and then there was not the strain of a pennant race. All the women declare they had a grand time, and every effort was made by our entertainers to take good care of them as well as the players. In each city where we made a stop plenty of automobiles were put at the ladies' disposal, and they had ample opportunity to see the sights. It was new territory to most of them, especially to the brides. Of course, they could not attend the banquets given us, but theatre seats were at their disposal, and they never kicked for entertainment.

The real, recent bridegrooms passed up the banquets, too. "Larry" Doyle, "Jeff" Tesreau, "Jim" Thorpe, and "Tex" Russell, after he was married, got to be great home lovers. You could not get them to any stag parties. They all denied they were henpecked, however.

I am looking forward to our visit to Japan with a great deal of anticipation. I believe that the teams are going to draw well there, and I base this notion on what I have heard along the coast here. The University of Washington sent a team to Japan a few years ago to play the native clubs, and the game made a big hit. The American nine played all the local university teams and drew enormous crowds. Now that the brown people are to get a look at big leaguers, they should come out in large numbers. They tell me that the Japanese are great natural players themselves, because of their quickness, but I am told that they are better fielders and runners than hitters. They do not take to the batting end of the game naturally. I intend to spend some time showing the Japanese the fine points of hitting. We also expect to split up and play native teams if we can arrange games. I am going to look over the players carefully in all the countries and ports on our itinerary, so do not be surprised if I introduce the National League fans to some new talent next season acquired on this trip.

Japan has always been a country that I have had a great desire to visit, and we intend to see the sights thoroughly. We are going to assume the rôle of American tourists and expect to be treated as such. So far, the party has made a great reputation for itself by the conduct of the players, and I want to say that I am proud of all the men, both on the White Sox and my club. I believe that Mr. Comiskey and I are going to be very much flattered by the impression that the party makes all the way around the world. So far, there has been no lack of harmony and no attempts on the part of any players to cut loose. The trip is not regarded as a joy junket, and I am frank to say that if any member of the party in my charge had attempted to act as if he thought it were, I would have promptly dropped him. This was thoroughly understood by all the players before we started, but the storm warnings were unnecessary, as all the men are gentlemen.

The trip has also given me an excellent opportunity to work out "Jim" Thorpe, and I predict that he is a coming star. Thorpe is learning the game rapidly, and has been playing good ball on this trip. He busts them on the nose, and is getting so he can use his speed on the bases and in the field. He will be very nearly a finished ball player when we return.

During some of the games on the trip the wives of the party have sat down on the players' benches, and it has been a joy to hear them talk. The brides take the work of their husbands very seriously, and any slur at them is a reflection on the wife. Mrs. Russell, Mrs. Tesreau, and Mrs. Thorpe are particularly loyal. Mrs. Meyers and Mrs. Doyle have had a lot of fun "kidding" the wives, as Mrs. Doyle does not take her husband's playing any more seriously than he does himself.

"That Indian Thorpe will never make a ball player," announced Mrs. Meyers during the game in Sacramento. "He may be a good runner, and he may have been an intimate friend of the King of Sweden once, but that does not make him hit the ball."

"What good does it do anybody to hit the ball if he can't move after he has connected?" asked Mrs. Thorpe. "Too bad 'Chief' Meyers has not more speed."

Mrs. Albert Russell, of course, is the latest bride, and she called her husband "Albert" for three days. But now she calls him "Tex." She is a great rooter, and no one can say anything about the pitching of Russell while she is within range and get away with it.

Before closing this letter and taking to the steamer I want to deny a report that I have in some of the eastern papers. These have said that Wilbert Robinson, who has been a close friend of mine for twenty years, and I have had trouble because he left the Giants to take hold in Brooklyn, and that we are no longer friends. That is not true. I gave "Robbie" his release so that he could accept the offer, and I wish him all the luck in the world except beating the Giants out for the pennant. "Robbie" has been a big help to me with my club, and I am going to miss him, because he has developed all the pitchers now on my staff with the exception of Mathewson and Wiltse. But I would not let his contract with the New York Club stand in his way when he had a chance to get a team of his own. It was for this reason that I gave him his unconditional release, letting a man go to whom I owe much.

Well, we're off.

ITALIAN CYCLISTS HERE.

Brocco and Verri to Ride as Team in Six-Day Race.

Maurice Brocco and Francisco Verri, who will be known as the Italian team in the coming six-day bicycle race at Madison Square Garden, starting Dec. 7, arrived in New York yesterday on the French liner La France. These are the first of the foreign riders to arrive here, the others being scheduled to sail from Havre yesterday. Dave Coburn, who will again act as trainer of the foreign riders during the long grind, met Mr. Italian team yesterday and arranged for both riders to go to Valisburg to-morrow to start training. Verri it addition to taking part in the long race, is to ride in a four-cornered match race against Kramer, Clarke, and Techicot on Dec. 6 in the preliminary races.

In Newark, the centre of cycle racing in the United States, followers of the six-day race are already "doping" out the big event. The team made up of Jackie Clarke and Paddy Hehir rules favorite since the announcement was made that Walter Rutt would be unable to take part in the long grind. The big German, with a good partner, would naturally be favored over any of the American riding combinations. Joe Fogler and Alf Goullet are second choice among the "wise ones," with the Root-McNamara and Grenda-Egan teams close behind in the figures already quoted. These four teams, all made up of experienced cyclists, are looked upon as likely to show the way to the other combinations, barring accidents that will put the riders out of the race.

GOLF ON NEARBY LINKS.

Dyker Meadow golfers took part in an 18-hole medal play handicap qualifying round for a cup offered by the members of the club who are affiliated with the United States Army or Navy. There were forty entries, and the first four qualified for match play. The scores: C. D. Burdick, 87, 21—66; E. F. Siney, 90, 20—76; F. D. Webster, 81, 8—73; L. O. Bergh, 84, 10—74; N. W. Wells, 85, 10—75; Frank Barton, 84, 8—76; J. W. Falson, 84, 8—76; Harold Rowe, 88, 12—76; D. B. Peabody, 89, 12—77; W. S. N. Watson, 88, 10—78; E. F. Hunt, 78, 0—78; B. D. Harrington, 93, 16—77; W. H. Zelgler, 87, 8—79; L. S. Parsons, 89, 10—79; C. J. Cockall, 82, 2—80.

Ward Thomas, with a card of 84, 8—76, was the winner in Class A of the 18-hole medal play handicap at the Country Club of Glen Ridge yesterday, while in the second set W. M. McClure, with 105, 27—78, showed the way. The scores: Class A—Ward Thomae, 84, 8—76; L. E. McCoy, 96, 19—77; C. A. Hungerford, 97, 20—77; W. E. Powers, 98, 18—80; J. Lounsberry, 98, 17—81; J. D. Newell, 97, 15—82; W. D. Lyon, 102, 18—83. Class B—W. M. McClure, 105, 27—78; T. W. Morrell, 103, 22—81; M. Sallen, 109, 27—82; H. L. Walker, 110, 27—83; G. D. White, 115, 27—88; J. L. Frost, 113, 22—91.

A handicap in three classes was the attraction at the Montclair Golf Club yesterday, E. F. Miller leading Class A with 96, 12—33, W. R. Hotchkin the second set with 93, 18—75, while F. L. Van Wie with 100, 20—80, showed the way in the third division. The following returned cards:

Class A.—E. F. Miller, 95, 12—83.
Class B.—W. R. Hotchkin, 93, 18—75; T. L. Gallagher, 92, 14—78; C. V. Drew, 95, 18—81.
Class C.—F. L. Van Wie, 100, 20—80.

With a card of 82, 13—69 C. E. Robertson led the field in the eighteen-hole medal play handicap at the Nassau Country Club yesterday. William L. Hicks the club champion, was third. The following cards were turned: C. E. Robertson, 82, 13—69; E. S. Willard, 93, 20—73; W. L. Hicks, 79, 2—77; W. W. Hester, 101, 24—77; H. W. Maxwell, 82, 5—77; A. T. Bedford, 102, 24—78; H. K. Ifudson, 88, 10—78; F. L. Noble, 104, 25—79; Judson Lounsberry, 100, 17—83.

In a sweepstakes at the Forest Hill Field Club yesterday, J. A. D. McCurdy won the first share with a card of 88, 17—71. Between twenty and thirty golfers took part, but the misty were frightened off when they heard of McCurdy's low total. The three best cards were as follows: J. A. D. McCurdy, 88, 17—71; T. J. Lintott, 90, 15—75; S. N. Wells, 101, 25—76.

Finishing 1 up, F. H. Edwards won the eighteen-hole match play competition against par at the Yountakah Country Club yesterday. The results follow: F. H. Edwards, 1 up; George B. Martin, 1 down; F. Grubb, 2 down; F. L. Curtis, 3 down; Marc M. Michael, 3 down; W. T. McVaugh, 3 down; E. D. Haywood, 4 down; W. S. Benson, 5 down; C. C. White, 6 down; W. F. Fegel, 7 down.

Only three cards were returned in the sweepstakes over the links of the Apawamis Club yesterday, Edmund Nash, with a card of 96, 18—78, was the winner. The others who handed in scures were W. A. Pratt, 90, 9—81, and Harmon S. Graves, 88, 6—82.

Handicap Golf at Wee Burn.

Special to The New York Times.

STAMFORD, Conn., Nov. 22.—A sixteen-hole handicap was played at Wee Burn Golf Club to-day, with the following results: Robert Hunter, 80, 5—75; C. S. Selleck, 81, 5—76; E. F. Lockwood, 90, 11—70; J. J. Cloonan, 100, 23—79; J. H. Staub, 95, 13—82; E. E. Rinehart, Jr., 95, 13—82; Dr. Frederick Schavoir, 91, 9—82; C. D. Lockwood, 109, 23—86.

PINCH HITTERS ONLY EFFECTIVE IN SPOTS

Substituting Batter for Good Pitcher in Crisis of Game Hardly Worth While.

By BILLY EVANS,
American League Umpire.

Is the pinch hitter a success? A majority of managers look on the pinch hitter with favor. Others employ the practice not so much because they favor it, but because fandom expects it. I knew one major league manager who has been successful with pinch hitters, yet he favors the abolition of the practice. That is a rather radical procedure, and I withhold the name of the manager so that he can escape the censure that no doubt would be heaped on him from many quarters.

Pinch hitting has become a mania with a great many leaders. Any time a hit means a run or two, even though it is early in the game, the pinch hitter is rushed into the battle. If he comes through with a hit everything is lovely and the manager is looked upon as a cunning strategist. If he fails, which is the case in a majority of attempts, and dire results follow the removal of this or that player, then the manager is roasted for making the shift.

How many pinch hitters can drive the ball safely more than once in four times at bat? Regulars who can hit .333 for the season must get the ball safe once in every three times at the plate. They have 154 games in which to reach such an average. It is foolish to ask a pinch hitter to deliver to that extent, who may be sent to the plate only once every third or fourth day. Practice trains the eye. The regular who is in the game every day is keyed up, while the pinch hitter, sitting on the bench, is just the opposite. Very often the pinch hitter fails to deliver more than once in five trips to the plate, and there are few pitchers who could do much worse.

In the recent world's series Connie Mack was criticised for his failure to use a pinch hitter in the ninth inning of the second game. Connie Mack is a great manager, that I know. He is only human and makes mistakes, but in my very humble opinion he didn't make one in that instance. I recently read where he was quoted as saying he would do the same thing over again, and I believe it. It will be recalled that in the ninth inning of the second game the Athletics had men on first and third bases with no one out. It looked like a sure run and the game, for up to that time neither club had been able to score, so masterly was the pitching of Mathewson and Plank.

Jack Lapp, the catcher, was the next hitter. In 1912 Lapp was regarded by many as the best hitting catcher in the American League. This year he slumped in his batting. All year he hit the ball on the nose, but in hard luck. It would not have been a wise plan to remove Lapp, as there was no one for him to hit the ball hard, and even if he failed to get it safe he might hit a long fly. He didn't, so that offered a point to criticise. While not a good hitter by any means, there are worse batsmen than Eddie Plank. He had looked good against Mathewson on former trips to the plate, and certainly was worth while taking a chance on.

Perhaps the one thing that kept Mack from using a pinch hitter in place of Plank was the wonderful article of ball the veteran was pitching. Imagine what would have been said of Mack had this situation arose because of a substitute for Plank. The substitute having failed to drive in the run that was needed to win, it was necessary to send in a pitcher in place of Plank. Bender, having worked in the opening game at New York, it was out of the question to use him. Thus Mack would have had to call on one of his young pitchers. Had a kid pitcher been used, and three runs made off his delivery, as were made off Plank in the tenth, Mack would have been severely criticised for putting a youngster into such an emergency in the series. Mack had a lot to think about when that situation came up, and he had to think quickly. I believe he did a pretty good job, even thought that game which seemed won was lost.

Practically every fan can recall some game in which a pitcher, who has kept the opposing team down to a run or two, is supplanted by a pinch hitter, who usually fails to deliver. The removal of the pitcher, to make room for the fruitless batter, of course, brings another pitcher into the game. Frequently the pitcher is not properly warmed up, with the result that he is frequently batted hard, and the enemy is able to walk away with a victory. Often the substitution of a pinch hitter for a pitcher, turns what had been a pitchers' battle into a farce.

Few major league managers have had more success with the pinch hitter than Fred Clarke, the clever leader of the Pittsburgh club. Time and again during the season Clarke has picked the proper spot to use Hans Hyatt, his sterling pincher. Hyatt's ability to come through in the crisis has been remarkable. Many a game was won because of the good judgment of the Pirate leader, and good hitting on the part of Hyatt. One would think that Clarke would be radically in favor of pinch hitting. One writer recently I heard the pinch hitter discussed pro and con, and the reply of Clarke to one of the questions asked was, to me, the proper solution of the pinch hitter problem.

"I like the idea of using a pinch hitter if a manager happens to have a fellow like Hyatt or McCormick, ready to the hitting, and a fellow like Walter Johnson to take up the pitching burden."

Unfortunately for the managers, there are few pinch hitters like McCormick and Hyatt and few pitchers like Walter Johnson. Invariably the pinch hitter is used for the pitcher. If would often be a better plan if the pinch hitter was used for some other member of the team. The substitution for the pitcher is not a bad idea if the pitcher is faltering. If the pitcher is going well and holding the opponents in check, it is often folly to weaken the box in what is usually an unsuccessful attempt to strengthen the hitting. During the season, if you look over the major or minor league scores for a week or so, you will note what the pinch hitters are doing, and what is happening to check it as to pitchers. Then it is evident that the pinch hitting strategy is a bit overdone.

Coupled with the pinch hitting mania, another practice is being employed to a large extent by various managers. It is the substitution of right-handed hitters in place of left-handed regulars, when a southpaw is pitching for the opposition. Manager Mack is a manager who uses such a system. In fact I believe Mack was one of the first managers to adopt such tactics. Frequently last year Mack would take two of his outfielders, Strunk and E. Murphy out of the game, and send in Walsh and D. Murphy, when a left-handed pitcher opposed the Athletics.

Perhaps better results are obtained from this procedure than from the use of the pinch hitter, but it also has a serious drawback; the shattering of the confidence of the player removed every time a southpaw works. In this connection I recall the case of an American League first baseman who is a left-handed batter. For the first three months of last season, against all kinds of pitching, he batted around the .300 mark. Then he had a bad day against a left-handed pitcher, striking out four times. Ever after when the team faced a southpaw he was yanked out of the line-up. Acoording to the player, while in the minors he always had hit left-handers, but constant removal from the game had so affected his confidence that in batting practice he was almost helpless before the southpaws.

Results obtained from some of the so-called strategic moves in baseball are open to argument.

TO ADVISE INDIANS.

Committee Named to Help Determine Athletic Policy.

Special to The New York Times.

CARLISLE, Penn., Nov. 22.—The authorities of the Carlisle Indian School announces the affiliation with the school's athletic association of an advisory committee composed of the following gentlemen:

Walter Camp, author, athletic authority, advisory coach to Yale University; Judge Frank Irvine, Dean Cornell University College of Law and former President of the Cornell University Athletic Council; Chancellor S. B. McCormick, LL. D., University of Pittsburgh; President E. A. Noble, LL. D., Dickinson College; James E. Sullivan, Secretary-Treasurer Amateur Athletic Union of the United States, and Secretary to the Olympic Games Committee.

This committee was formed so as to obtain in the conduct of athletics at the school outside counsel and view point of leading college men, besides the immediate supervision here and through the Indian office. While there is an athletic association at the school, regularly formed and incorporated, which has been in existence a number of years, most of the alumni live in the Far West, and the student members are boys and girls of limited education with little knowledge of the ethics of college and school athletics, except what they learn at the school and by their contact with athletic teams of other institutions. It is felt at the Carlisle School that the Advisory Committee composed of prominent men associated with college athletics will be of great assistance in the determination of questions of athletic policy.

FOR CLASS C TITLE.

Amateur Billiardists to Start Play in Third Annual Series.

The third annual tournament of the National Association of Amateur Billiardists for the national Class C amateur championship at 18.2 balkline billiards will begin to-morrow afternoon at the Morningside Billiard Academy, 125th Street and Lenox Avenue.

A silver loving cup standing 18 inches high has been offered, emblematic of the championship, and must be won twice by the same player before becoming his personal property. This year's play will mark the beginning of a series for a new trophy, as the one originally donated was won by C. B. Terry of Palisade Park, N. J., the present champion, by his successive victories in 1911 and 1912.

Terry will be a contender in defense of his title, and with a number of the veteran players of the past two years, in addition to at least four newcomers of promise, the tourney this year gives every indication of being closely contested. The majority of the cuelsts are local amateurs, with Terry and Dr. H. W. Hawley of Danbury, Conn., makins up the out-of-town contingent. Three players are entered from Brooklyn and the New York Athletic Club crack, Robert Weld, will represent the Mercury Foot organization.

Beginning to-morrow afternoon two games will be played each day until the tourney is completed. A matinee will take place at 3:00 P. M. and the evening game will start at 7:45 P. M. The games will be for 200 points. Play will be divided into sections, each of which will consist of a round robin, and the winners of these will play a final round to determine the championship. Rules of the N. A. A. B. P. will govern the tournament.

HOBE BAKER'S HONORS.

Princeton Football Captain Awarded "P" Fifth Time.

Special to The New York Times.

PRINCETON, N. J., Nov. 22.—The Undergraduate Athletic Committee has announced the following awards of the 'Varsity letter, insignia, and class numerals as a result of the athletic contests held so far this year. The following men were awarded the 'Varsity "P" for participating in either the Yale-Princeton or Harvard-Princeton football games:

Capt. H. A. H. Baker, J. S. Baker, H. R. Ballin, E. Trenkmann, F. Trenkmann, H. M. Lamberton, F. Glick, W. H. Hammond, B. C. Law, G. F. Phillips, C. H. Semmens, H. G. Brown, E. L. Shea, J. B. Streit, and W. Swart. The letter was also awarded to W. H. Bass, manager of the team.

H. H. Barnett was awarded the letter for winning first place in the cross-country meet with Yale at Princeton.

Insignia awards by the committee were as follows: Crew—Capt. T. C. Briggs, E. E. Bunzel, J. J. Heffron, J. C. McRibben, A. B. Purdy, A. W. Putnam, R. Quimby, and G. G. Sikes. Tennis, for participation in the intercollegiate tennis tournament, held in September)—G. M. Church, A. M. Kidder, W. S. Kuhn, and B. C. Law.

Gun team insignia for the shoot with Yale: A. J. Doyle, J. Hoag, J. R. Johnston, N. Reed, and D. T. Turner.

Freshman insignia were awarded to the 1917 football members as follows: K. L. Ames, P. G. Bigler, A. C. Brown, D. D. Chapin, C. A. Dickerman, E. H. Driggs, R. Eberstadt, J. E. Eddy, P. W. Foster, J. R. Gemert, H. E. Gowen, C. C. Highley, F. T. Hogg, P. B. Knowlton, W. L. McLean, W. B. Moore, and I. W. Rogers. The 1915 numeral was awarded to J. M. Smith as manager of the team.

Capt. Baker now leads the list for having been awarded the letter the largest number of times. The reward for the football season gives him the honor of having won it five different times—three times in football and twice in hockey—as often as he could possibly win it under the two-major sport rule which prevails in Princeton. There are two men who have won it three times—George F. Phillips three times in football and Thornton Emmons twice in hockey and once in football. A total of forty-four men in the university at present are entitled to wear the letter.

New Players for Newark Club.

Pitcher Fred M. Walker, who pitched fairly well for the Brooklyn Club last season, has been released to the Newark Club of the International League. The Brooklyn Club will also release Substitute Infielder Bayard Taylor, last year with the Oshkosh Club, to the Newark Club when waivers are secured.

N. Y. A. C. GUNNERS OUTSHOOT TIGERS

Princeton Team No Match for Home Five—Ties Feature Other Shoots.

Trapshooters from Princeton University were badly beaten by the gunners of the New York Athletic Club at Travers Island yesterday. The Tigers were no match for the Winged Foot experts, who won a five-man team race by 93 targets. The aggregate totals were 433 to 340 targets in favor of the Travers Island nimrods. R. L. Spotts was the high gun of the winning team, breaking 94 out of a possible 100 targets. The cleverest Tiger was D. G. Turner, who had a total of 84 "kills" to his credit.

It looked like old times at Travers Island yesterday. Twenty-two gunners were on the firing line and in addition to the team shoot they decided a lengthy programme of weekly fixture. Practically every event ended in a tie and it was necessary to have a shoot off before the winner could be announced. The fun started in the November Cup in which R. R. Debacher, T. Lenane, Jr., and H. H. Duden all tied for the prize. After two shoot-offs the winner finally proved to be Mr. Duden.

There would have been nine gunners tied for the club trophy had not R. L. Spotts made a straight score of 25 targets from scratch. The other eight nimrods all had full scores, but as they shot with handicaps the victory was credited to Mr. Spotts. R. R. Debacher and W. B. Ogden were in a tie for the Accumulation Cup, the latter winning on the shoot-off by 24 to 20 targets.

The Travers Island Trophy saw a tie among Dr. E. R. DeWolfe, H. H. Duden and Dr. Culver. All had full scores of 25 targets. In the shoot-off, Dr. DeWolfe kept up his good work and again had a full total, winning from Mr. Duden by three targets. The High Average, which recognizes all shots, and for the first time this season the High Handicap shoot ended in a tie. H. H. Duden and R. R. Debacher each had 99 out of 100 targets. The shoot-off was won by the latter.

Dr. Culver won the Distance Handicap with a total of 95 out of 100 targets, shooting from the 20-yard mark. Several professionals shot along with the amateurs, including T. A. Davis and W. H. Hammond. There will be a holiday shoot at Travers Island on Thanksgiving Day. The scores:

Marine and Field Club Shoot.

Interesting shooting was witnessed at the Bath Beach traps of the Marine and Field Club yesterday. Eight gunners were on the firing line and decided the three events that were on the programme under excellent shooting conditions. Frank B. Stephenson was the principal winner. He started his good work by scoring 3 points in the shoot for the President's Cup. His total in the event was 91 out of a possible 100 targets. He also was high gun in the shoot for the Monthly Cup. In the event he had 45 out of a possible 50 targets, shooting from scratch. The Take Home Trophy was captured by President Paul R. Towne, only, however, after a shoot-off against S. P. Hopkins. In the original event each gunner had 91 out of a possible 100 targets. The shoot-off was at 25 targets and President Towne broke 15 against his opponent's 14 blue rocks.

Haworth Country Club Officers.

At the annual meeting of the Haworth Country Club, W. S. Cuwie was re-elected President to serve next year. Other officers were chosen as follows: First Vice President, Louis B. Harrison; Second Vice President, Marius De Brabant; Secretary and Treasurer, William E. Kastendike. It was announced that the club has made highly satisfactory progress during the last year and that some course changes are in view for next season. The links never have been in such fine condition as at present and this is attributed largely to the piping of the course.

Y. M. C. A. Cross-Country Run.

Clement C. Wells of the Young Men's Christian Association has donated a trophy for the annual Thanksgiving Day cross-country run of the association, which will be held over the Prospect Park course, beginning at 10 o'clock. The donation of this trophy has aroused considerable interest among the hill-and-dale chasers of the Brooklyn Central branch, and it is expected that a field of twenty-five will turn out to compete. The race will be a handicap affair.

CRESCENT A. C. BOUTS.

Professionals Show Their Skill in the Ring for Brooklynites.

Crescent Athletic Club members and their friends witnessed the first professional boxing series of the Winter season last night held by the new moon organization in the club gymnasium. Aside from the regularly scheduled "goes" between men of minor fame in the ring, the exhibitions with well-known boxers as the principals quite filled the eyes of the many spectators.

Freddie Welsh, the English champion lightweight, "went on" with his sparring partner and gave a very acceptable exhibition of boxing art. Battling Lavinsky, assisted by Johnny Howard and Knockout Brown, provided amusement for the crowd with a battle royal, and Mike Glover boxed three two-minute sessions with a "friend."

Young Regan administered the sleep punch to Young Morris in the second round of what was to have been a ten-round encounter, with the aid of a blow over the heart, which sent Morris into slumberland for considerably over the ten-second limit, causing the referee, Eddie Forbes, some concern before the beaten boxer was restored to normal condition.

Willie Green and Young Ryan boxed six rounds to a draw, and Young Wagner defeated Young Le Roy in a bout which went ten rounds.

Diry Wins at Brown's.

Bob Diry defeated Jack McGrave in the fourth round of his scheduled ten-round bout at Brown's Gymnasium A. A. last night. McGrave was at least holding his opponent even until the fourth round when Diry sent in a hard blow to the stomach and McGrave expressed himself as through. The semi-final ten-round bout between George Collins and Willie Catton, west side boxers, was easily the best bout of the programme. Both contestants mixed it willingly from the start of the bout, but Catton was entitled to the honors for the first half of the bout. He floored his opponent several times during the bout, and in the seventh session the referee was forced to stop the bout to save Collins from further punishment. In the scheduled six-round bout between Frankie Carbo, of the east side, and Hugh MacDonald, the referee was forced to stop the bout in the fourth round to save the latter.

Young Brown Beats Cortez.

Three interesting ten round bouts were witnessed by the patrons of the Queensboro Athletic Club of Long Island last night. The main contest brought together Andy Cortez and Young Brown, the east side lightweight. Brown was the aggressor from the start and was entitled to the honors.

In the semi-final bout Bob Spencer of Boston and Young Murphy of Connecticut, colored boxers, were the contestants, and in the 8th round the referee was forced to intercede to save Murphy from further punishment. In the first ten round contest the referee was forced to call a halt, Jack Gorman of Masseth having Joe Harmon, a New York boxer, in such a pitiable condition at this stage that a knockout was imminent.

Willie Jones Outpoints Brooks.

Willie Jones of Brooklyn had a shade the better of his ten-round bout with Walter Brooks at the Fairmont Athletic Club last night, winning the honors in the majority of rounds on his aggressiveness. Brooks, however, was willing and anxious to mix matters at all times, but Jones piled up points in the early rounds which proved insurmountable. The semi-final bout of ten rounds between Eddie Moy of Allentown, Penn., and Mike Mazie of Staten Island, resulted in a draw, and in the first ten-round contest Young Moore administered Frank a bad beating to Charlie Parelli that the latter left the ring, conceding his opponent's superiority at the end of the fourth round.

Donovan and McAlister in Bout.

Bobby McAllister, the new middleweight from the West, will make his Eastern debut on Wednesday night at the Fairmont A. C. in the feature event, scheduled for ten rounds, with Young Mike Donovan as his opponent. Reports from places where McAllister has performed say he will prove one of the sensations of the year. Donovan has had a fairly successful career and will serve as a good opponent to test the skill of the Western entrant. A great deal depends on the outcome of this contest for both men. If McAllister wins it will stamp him as a formidable opponent for others, and if Donovan is successful his manager, Jimmy Johnson, wants to match the two men at his weight with the hope of reaching the top. The regular Fairmont card of preliminaries will be staged before the final number.

Freddy Welsh at Bowery Club,

In anticipation of a hard contest with Phil Bloom, a local boxer, on next Tuesday night at the Atlantic Garden A. C. of the Bowery, Freddy Welsh, the English champion, is training at the New West Side A. C. Welsh will not depend on his reputation to win the bout over the local boy, which fact is made evident by the time and attention which he is devoting to his training. A title holder usually has an edge on an opponent, but Welsh cannot win victories, and consequently the Briton will fit himself as best he can for the coming contest. Bloom is also making unusual preparations at a Brooklyn gymnasium. While not a hard puncher, Bloom is a clever boxer, fast on his feet, and quick to see an advantage.

CHURCHILL TELLS OF HIS REFORMS

Head of Education Board Defends His Administration at Hunter Association Dinner.

FOUND COURSES TOO HEAVY

Science Studies In Schools Made Stevens Institute Look Like Kindergarten, He Says.

President Thomas W. Churchill of the Board of Education, against whose reappointment President Nicholas Murray Butler of Columbia University and others protested in a letter sent to Mayor Kline, spoke last night at a dinner of the Thomas Hunter Association at the Hotel Astor. Mr. Churchill defended his policies on the board and denounced his critics. He spoke sarcastically of the "place I temporarily hold," and continued:

"I am a public-school boy and, therefore, not an expert on education in the City of New York. If I had come from some bucolic region it would be impossible to send detectives to ascertain my pedagogical lack of training. I got my education in the public schools and the City College. There I got my notions of what education should be. They then had courses of study which are not the heterogeneous things we know to-day. I don't care what is taught, even if it is the game of bridge, if it is well taught, thoroughly taught, it is educational. And it is not educational if it is not taught thoroughly. The principal thing in teaching is to promote the spirit of inquiry and the love of truth."

President Churchill said that now that automobiles had made the streets, "the natural playground of the boys of the city," unsafe, he favored a liberal policy toward playgrounds and recreation centres. He said:

"When I came into the Board of Education, I had been a teacher in the evening high schools. I naturally turned to examine the courses of study in all departments. I was astounded to find that they had in the course of study for elementary schools a course in natural science that made Stevens Institute look like a kindergarten. I found that they had put out of arithmetic the kind of knowledge that a plumber, or a clerk, could use when he left school in his daily life and in making a living and had substituted a course loaded with what was technical and abstruse and of no practical value.

"The whole course of study reminded me of the anecdote of the students who for a hoax brought to Darwin a creature made up of a centipede's body, a butterfly's wing, a grasshopper's legs and a beetle's head. They asked Darwin:

"'What sort of a bug is this?'

"He replied:

"'Did it hum when you got him?'

"It did,' they answered.

"'Then it's a humbug.'

"That was the case with the course of study—things had been added onto it without rhyme or reason.

"I saw a hierarchy in the public school system. The Board of Education was a cipher—a mere appendix. The board could pass on lead pencils, on rubber bands, on buildings, but the course of study was sacrosanct. That could not be handled by the board—that was a matter for pedagogues. I believed that the citizen, even with the taint of birth about him, had the right to say whether the course of study embodied what his children needed.

"Now, there is no politics in the board and never was that I could discover until the last few weeks. And whoever says there was tells a downright, deliberate lie. There is no politics in politics. But we are not looking for public advocates. There is some dignity in the board that prevents it from advertising fictitious quarrels and fighting its battles in the newspapers.

"What is there in this talk that the board has deteriorated? Mayor Gaynor appointed eleven new members to the board. I defy any one to go over the board and point out any member of it who is not a public-spirited citizen of high character and zealous in the public service. I have had the honor of being the high honor of saying that I exert some subtle, malevolent, hypnotic influence over the board. There is Mr. Man, who could buy and sell me socially, politically, and financially. Do they mean to insinuate that I have crushed Mr. Man or any of his fellow-members?

"There was a lot of wild discussion about a few bills, the notorious McKee bills. They were put up by a Princeton man, surely not so lowly, and by a former member of the Board of Education, pretty low, but they struck a good average. One bill gave the president of the board power to designate teachers and others to investigate and report to the board. That was revolutionary, except in a well-managed corporation. But it was a flea bite to the recommendation of the Hanus Committee, which recommended the establishment of a bureau of investigation. The second bill gave the board power to initiate changes. Then there was a bill to have district Superintendents elected directly, instead of being the rubber stamp to act upon the recommendation of associate Superintendents, by whom they are now elected directly. This may have been debatable. These were the notorious McKee bills, stamped with iniquity."

Mr. Churchill went on to say that his policies had "vitalized the class room and emancipated the teacher." He said the board had never given every one the right of free speech and denied a monopoly of it. He closed with a tribute to Dr. Hunter, whom he said would have made a distinguished name in any other calling, but who preferred that of a teacher, which he called the highest.

Three hundred guests attended the dinner and gave Dr. Hunter the Chautauqua salute when he arose to speak. Silent toasts were drunk to members of the association who had died in the last year—W. J. K. Kenny, Ernest Bienzle, Theodore F. Miller, Dr. Richard Van Sanptvoord, and Max E. Bernheimer.

At the speakers' table were Justice Francis M. Scott of the Appellate Division, Marcus M. Marks, Borough President-elect of Manhattan; Alrick H. Man, President Thomas W. Williams of the Hunter Association, the Rev. Dr. Warren W. Giles, George W. Fortmeyer, said to be the oldest living member of the association, and Frank Moss, Assistant District Attorney.

At the tables among the old alumni of Public School 32 on West Thirteenth Street, of which Dr. Hunter was Principal from 1850 to 1870, were many distinguished men in all walks of life. These included Supreme Court Justice Bartow S. Weeks, Robert J. Wilkins, Prof. Irving R. Fisher, State Senator George W. Simpson, President Charles Strasa of the Water Board, De Witt J. Seligman, David M. Newberger of the American Civic Alliance, Judge Joseph F. Mulqueen of General Sessions, Henry W. Van Deventer, Dr. Thomas Darlington, J. Van Vechten Olcott, Sheriff Julius Harburger, William C. Penney, George F. Lyon, Daniel P. Hays, Ben M. Herts, Jesse Shulman, Attorney General of Montana; James E. Smith, and Roland S. Kinsheedt.

Dr. Hunter said that his eighty-second birthday, a fortnight ago, had been gladdened by the realization that he had missed none of the sixteen annual reunions of the association.

Letters from District Attorney Whitman and Ambassador James W. Gerard were read, expressing admiration for Dr. Hunter and interest in the association. President Williams announced that the officers of the association had decided to incorporate it, and that, beginning in January, a gold medal would be given each year to one girl in the graduating class each January and June at the Washington Irving High School as a reward for cheerfulness, industry, attainments and general fitness.

CHURCHILL PREPARES REPORT.

Head of Board Thought to Know Mayor's Attitude Toward Him.

The question of whether Mayor Kline will reappoint Thomas W. Churchill a member of the Board of Education, or yield to the advice of President Butler of Columbia University, and select another person, will be settled on Wednesday. Mayor Kline announced this yesterday in response to questions from those who desired to send petitions and letters of advice to him.

President Churchill seemed to have received some indication of the Mayor's attitude toward him, for he stopped work yesterday on a long review of his administration which he had been preparing to submit to the Mayor.

Mr. Churchill, in the part of the review prepared before he stopped work upon it, took up the problem of the teachers who, he said, had been suppressed under City Supt. Maxwell until they had ceased to take an aggressive interest in school affairs. He took up also the efforts of his administration to adjust the school work to each locality, giving a great deal more attention to English, for instance, in the lower east side than on the upper west side, where the children could be served best by other studies.

He insisted that Mr. Maxwell's opposition to his reappointment grew out of the abolition of the old "static" system of a universal course of study for the whole city and out of pique because teachers could get a hearing from the Board of Education direct if they had suggestions to offer.

Alrick H. Man, who was appointed a member of the Board of Education by Mayor Seth Low and reappointed by Mayor McClellan, answered yesterday the charges contained in President Butler's letter to the Mayor so far as they referred to the condition of school discipline.

"The charge of President Butler that political influences have controlled action by the board," he said, "is without the slightest basis in fact. It is impossible for it to be true for the reason that each promotion has been made from the top of an eligible list, and many members of the Board of Education have watched the progress of men promoted strictly on their merits through long periods of time."

Members of the Board of Superintendents, who would have benefitted or would have been hurt through a system of promotions on account of political influence, came out in support of President Churchill. Associate City Superintendent John H. Haaren, Andrew W. Edson, Edward B. Shallow, and William Ettinger issued statements in which they said they had never heard of an instance of promotion through political influence. They said that it was not true that they had ever been interfered with in their professional work or in the performance of their purely scholastic duties. All three of the associate Superintendents put emphasis upon the spirit of co-operation which they insisted prevailed between their board and the Board of Education.

MISS TALBOT A BRIDE.

Married to Charles F. Wilson in St. John's Church, Washington.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 22.—The marriage of Miss Amyilta Talbot to Charles Frederick Wilson, both of Washington, took place this afternoon in St. John's Church, Lafayette Square, in the presence of a distinguished gathering, with the rector of the church, the Rev. Dr. Roland Cotton Smith, officiating.

The ushers were Frederick Decourcey Faust, John Spalding Flannery, Harry F. Whiting, Blair Waites, Harris Hammond, Dr. Cary Grayson, U. S. N., all of Washington, and Stuart Jackson of New York.

The bride, who wore a modish gown of white satin, with tulle veil, was escorted by her brother, Earl Talbot of Syracuse, N. Y., and preceded by three bridesmaids. The bridegroom was attended by his brother, Claybourne Wilson.

Mary Carson's Debut at Century.

Miss Mary Carson, who makes her first New York appearance in "Hänsel and Gretel" at the Century Opera House on Thanksgiving Day, is an American girl. She was born in Texas. She pursued her operatic studies in Italy and sang there both in opera and in concerts. She sings in Italian, French, German, and English.

PAVLOWA CARNIVAL DEC. 19.

Music School Settlement Benefit at the Metropolitan.

For the benefit of the Music School Settlement a Pavlowa Carnival will be held at the Metropolitan Opera House on the afternoon of Dec. 19 under the auspices of the Directors of the settlement. The entertainment will mark the farewell appearance in New York this season of Anna Pavlowa. The date of the carnival falls on the Czar's birthday, and members of the Imperial Russian Embassy are to take part in the celebration.

Among others who are assisting in the affair are Mr. and Mrs. Albert H. Wiggin, Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Pulitzer, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Morgenthau, Otto Kahn, Mrs. Howard Mansfield, Mrs. Miles Carpenter, Miss Christine V. Baker, Miss Charlotte S. Baker, Mrs. Charles Hallaway, V. Everit Macy, Mrs. Andrew Carnegie, John B. Archbold, Sydney C. Borg, and Miss Helen Brice.

Mme. Pavlowa with her Imperial Ballet of forty dancers will devote two and a half hours to the programme, after which there will be a fête dansant in the Metropolitan foyer, with the Pavlowa's orchestra, under the direction of Theodore Steier, to furnish the music. Many well-known young actresses, who will be attired in Russian costumes, have volunteered to sell flowers, and society girls will sell autographed photographs of Pavlowa.

There will be a Russian restaurant, too, with actors to serve as waiters.

Green Room Club Revue on Dec. 7.

The Green Room Club will hold its annual revue on Sunday night, Dec. 7, when a sketch, "A Travesty on the Movies," will be one of the features of the entertainment. Many of the moving-picture stars and actors from the legitimate stage will take part. William A. Brady is the stage director, and among those who will take part in the movie sketch will be John Bunny, Frank Crayne, and Maurice Costello of the Film world and De Wolf Hopper, George M. Cohan, Raymond Hitchcock, Douglas Fairbanks, Wallace Eddinger, Donald Brian, Sam Bernard, Lew Fields, and Herbert Corthell are to appear in the revue.

Beatrice La Palme Sings at Century

Beatrice La Palme made her first appearance here as a principal soprano last evening when she sang Leonora in "Il Trovatore" at the Century Opera House. She made a favorable impression with the large audience. Her voice is brilliant rather than warm or colorful, but it is of excellent quality, especially in the high notes, which she sang with ease. The other rôles were in the hands of Walter Wheatley, Morton Adkins, Mary Jordan, and Alfred Kaufmann.

Mme. Lina Cavalieri Arrives.

Mme. Lina Cavalieri, the operatic soprano, arrived yesterday on the French liner France to join the Boston Opera Company. She will sing in the opera of "Francesca Da Rimini" in Boston for the first time in this country. Lucien Muratore, the tenor of the Boston Opera Company, arrived on the same steamer.

Woman Suffrage Dances.

The Twenty-seventh Assembly District of the Woman Suffrage Party has arranged a series of small dances to be given during the Winter, and the first will take place Tuesday evening at the headquarters of the New York State Suffrage Association, 180 Madison Avenue.

Ex-Ambassador Leishman Arrives.

John G. A. Leishman, former Ambassador to Germany, arrived last night on the steamship France. His daughter, the Comptess de Gontaut Biron, is to be married on Tuesday to James Hazen Hyde. The wedding will take place in Paris. Mr. Leishman said that business affairs which required his immediate attention made it impossible for him to remain in Paris for the wedding.

DROP IN BUSINESS ON STOCK EXCHANGE

Total Sales for the Week Ended Yesterday the Lowest in Sixteen Years.

INVESTORS HOLDING OFF

Anti-Trust Suits and Disclosures Like Those of Frisco Road Have Discouraged Them.

Sales of shares on the Stock Exchange for the week that closed yesterday were the smallest recorded for a similar period in sixteen years. The total sales were 524,000 shares, considerably less than in the week ended on July 11, when it was 794,000, although that week saw a lower total for one day than yesterday's. The low water mark of July 12 was 43,850, while yesterday's total was 52,322.

Brokers talk longingly of the times when 1,000,000-share days were not uncommon. Months ago, they thought things had reached an almost irreducible minimum, only to see a constant dwindling since, with a new low record last week. For September this year the amount was only 75 per cent. of last September's October's business was only about half that of last October's, and now November is showing only 35 per cent. of last November's

The trading last week was at the rate of 104,000 shares a day, or less than 100 shares a day for each of the 1,100 members of the Exchange. For buying or selling 100 shares for an outsider a broker receives a commission of $12.50, but as every sale implies a purchase, each of two brokers receives $12.50 when 100 shares change hands, or $25 in all. This means that on last week's business the 1,100 brokers would average less than $24 a day each.

It is often pointed out that although there are 1,100 members, they include such persons as John D. Rockefeller and others who are not really brokers, and that only 300 or 400 members actually conduct a commission business. This consideration would increase the average earnings of the active members, but not to an extent likely to lead them into any wild extravagance.

As an offset to this apparent increase in average earnings it must also be remembered that a large part of the business consists of dealings between floor traders, or members trading for their own accounts, in which cases no commissions are paid. There is no way of determining just how much of the business is between members, but it is a fact that the more the trading dwindles the greater is the proportion of such transactions; in such markets as have prevailed lately it has been estimated at from one-third to one-half of the total.

As a rule only one member of a firm has a Stock Exchange seat, so that the 300 or 400 members represent perhaps three or four times as many individuals comprising the firms, among whom the profits must be divided. When a sum like $24 a day is apportioned among such a number, with all the expenses for rent, clerks, telephone and telegraph wires, to be met, it is not surprising that many firms complain that they are doing business at a loss.

There has been much talk lately of brokerage houses going out of business at the end of the year, and the cause is not far to seek. As it is, many houses have in the last couple of years reduced their office space and their clerical forces, but still are overmanned and have altogether too much room for their needs.

It is not unusual to spend an hour or more in a good-sized broker's office without seeing anybody come in or hearing a telephone call, while the ticker, usually counted on to give an air of cheerful briskness to the place, is silent for minutes at a time. Just as somebody gets an idea that the service has broken down it starts up to record a single sale, and subsides into inactivity again.

Brokers who admittedly are not making their rent are said to be keeping up their establishments on the accumulated profits of other years, hoping for a return of public interest in stocks at some future time, with something approaching the profits of the old days. Some of them wag their heads and predict that the old days are gone forever, but others are more optimistic. An ex-President of the Exchange said yesterday that he had seen long periods of dullness before and he had always seen boom times return.

"Well, I hope they are satisfied," said another prominent broker, "with the results of these money trust investigations and attacks on the Stock Exchange. They have succeeded in killing off the investment business, and all that remains is the professional speculation which they denounce.

"We have had for years customers whom we could call on the telephone at any time when we had something that looked like a bargain, with the assurance that they would buy. These same people now discuss such propositions with us, agree that stocks are too low, and conclude by saying that they are not doing anything in our line."

Some brokers are frank to say that revelations such as have resulted from the investigation of the Frisco failure are not calculated to draw the public back into the market, even if there were no such things as world-wide exhaustion of capital, anti-trust suits, reduced tariffs, currency bills, and Mexican imbroglios.

Arrivals from Europe.

Transatlantic liners arriving yesterday and some of their passengers were:

ADRIATIC (Liverpool)—Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Avery, H. A. Ayers, Herbert Barber, A. F. Clarke, Mrs. W. H. Clifford, J. J. Cullen, L. W. Guyn, J. B. Hamilton, Mr. and Mrs. G. E. Howard, W. H. H. J. JOHNSON DRUGGED.

Philadelphia Engineer in San Francisco Tells Queer Story to Police.

Special to The New York Times.

SAN FRANCISCO, Nov. 22.—Horace Jones Johnson, an engineer, of 613 West Fifty-fifth Street, Philadelphia, who says he has erected some of the largest structures in Philadelphia and New York, is at the Detention Hospital suffering from the effect of drugs given to him, he avers, by two adventuresses who robbed him. He says that for ten days his mind was blank. He applied for help to the Detective Department to-day and told a queer story.

"Several weeks ago," he said, "I came to San Francisco to take a place as head of the working force of the contracting firm of Dealy & Tibbetts. After inspecting the work on the water-front I was returning to my hotel when two ladies met me and calling me by name said they had an important matter to refer to me. They suggested we go to a neighboring grill. I remember taking a cocktail and that is all."

DISCUSS TRUANT PROBLEMS

Men Teachers Entertain Their Superintendents at Dinner.

The Association of Men Teachers and Principals of the City of New York held their annual Fall dinner last night at the Hotel St. Denis in honor of Associate Supt. William L. Ettinger and District Supts. William A. Boylan, John S. Roberts, and Arthur C. Perry.

The principal speakers were Edward B. Shallow, Associate Superintendent; Howard C. Nudd of the Publication Society, Gustave Straubenmuller, Associate Superintendent; Stephen P. Duggan of the City College, and John Temple Graves. The subject for discussion was "Truancy and Delinquency."

No Belgian Exhibit at Fair.

BRUSSELS, Nov. 22.—It is announced that the Belgium Government has decided not to participate in the Panama-Pacific Exposition at San Francisco in 1915 for reasons similar to those given by Germany and Great Britain, and because the United States did not participate officially in the expositions held at Brussels and Ghent, although Belgium was largely represented at St. Louis.

Male Stenographers Are Lacking.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 22.—A dearth of male stenographers is occupying the attention of the Civil Service Commissioners, who are vainly seeking applicants for positions paying from $840 to $900 a year. Women apparently have driven their male competitors from the field.

THEATRICAL NOTES.

Louise Dresser of the "Potash and Perlmutter" company will assist at the musicale and tea which the Ladies' Auxiliary of the German Hilfsverein will give on the afternoon of Dec. 2 in the grand ballroom of the Waldorf-Astoria.

The Screen Club yesterday dedicated the first moving picture actors' clubhouse, at 165 West Forty-seventh Street, where a housewarming was held from noon until early this morning. Many well-known actors took part in the celebration.

Henrietta Crosman will end her engagement in "The Tongues of Men" at the Harris Theatre next Saturday night, and on the following Monday night Louis Mann will appear at the theatre in "Children of To-Day," a three-act play by Clara Lipman. Mr. Mann will be supported by Emily Ann Wellman, Maude Turner Gordon, Adoni Fo-cieri, Margaret Templeton, Charles Balsar, Lorin Raker, and Robert Strange.

Grace George will produce here new play, "Miss Jenny O'Jones," Thanksgiving Day, at Springfield, Mass., and not in Wilmington, as was first planned. Miss George will go from Springfield to Boston for a two weeks' engagement, and then come into a Broadway theatre with the Avery Hopwood comedy.

Charles Frohman has engaged May Buckley for the role of Margaret Holt in "The Conspiracy." Miss Buckley, who has just returned from a tour in Alice Hegan Rice's "Romance of Billy Goat Hill," succeeds Mary Keener. Miss Keener being compelled by illness to rest for the remainder of the season.

F. F. Proctor will open his new vaudeville theatre in Mount Vernon to-morrow afternoon, and this will make the twenty-second theatre in the Proctor circuit, with other houses in course of construction in Newark and Troy. The new theatre in Mount Vernon represents an investment of nearly $1,000,000.

L. M. Goldstadt, who is arranging Ben Greet's twelfth annual season in the open air in this country, is on his way to Texas to close contracts with universities in that State for presentation next Spring.

To-morrow night Fanny Ward will celebrate her hundredth performance of "Madam President" at the Garrick Theatre.

BRONX BUFFALOES CUT YOUNG JEAMS

Social Leaders of the Herd Have Evidently Put Him on the Black List.

HARD TO FIND HIS OFFENSE

Perhaps They Don't Like His Name, Snyder Suggests, or He Made an Early Mistake.

Charley Snyder, keeper and student of wild animals in the Zoological Park in the Bronx, is at present studying the case of Jeams, a young bull buffalo. Through a combination of circumstances the animal has become the outcast of the herd, shunned by his kind and regarded as a "natural cuss" by most of his keepers. Perhaps the animal is handicapped by his name, for as Snyder remarked yesterday, in telling the story of Jeams and his troubles, "one would as soon expect a buffalo bull to be named Jeams as to expect a six-foot grenadier to answer 'here' when Percy was shouted at roll-call or to hear an angular spinster answer to the name of Phyllis." Snyder thinks the initial handicap is the name.

Jeams was born in a herd on one of our National parks in the west. He with some half dozen other buffaloes came to the Bronx when quite young. At first he, with the other youngsters, led the happy-go-lucky life of his kind. But Snyder avers that Jeams was never a "mixer" and this with the additional drawback of an ill selected name proved too much for what was at one time considered a growing popularity. Jeams is now five years old. It was "Old Bill," a keeper, who first noticed that Jeams was being shunned by the herd and called Snyder's attention to it. The latter investigated and discovered a strange state of affairs.

The keeper found that unlike other animals who had won the hatred of the leaders of their band, there was not the slightest open hostility to Jeams. He was just quietly ignored.

"You and I have seen just such cases in the course of human lives," explained Snyder. "Mrs. Smith tells her little boy not to play with Willie Brown or Johnnie Jones's mother warns her son that he must have nothing to do with Teddy White. Well, there is the same sort of feeling against Jeams, and it is united."

Snyder's observations covered months. He noticed the growing feeling of contempt spreading through the herd. In every quarter Jeams was constantly made to feel that he was a social outcast.

The keeper has seen Jeams saunter up to a group of buffaloes and noted how the group separated. There seemed to be some word, if the expression can be used, passed around, and each buffalo wanders away. It was not offensively done, but was none the less effective. Once the keeper, determined to test the feeling, placed Jeams in a far inclosure.

"It was interesting to note the relief with which the absence of the offensive animal was noted," said Snyder. "You have seen the same feeling shown in the interest displayed by a group of gossipers when a prospective subject for discussion gets out of hearing."

After an absence of a week the young bull was put back in the buffalo inclosure. He seemed positively glad to get back. At first he did not appear to notice anything wrong, Snyder avers, but in time he began to take notice of the scornful way in which he was being treated. Then the whole thing got on his nerves, and instead of being a good-natured youngster Jeams became despondent and developed a melancholia that has become chronic.

Many a long week Snyder spent trying to figure out the cause of all this. For days he hung about the buffalo inclosure playing the spy upon the herd. He thought that beside the natural failure of Jeams to mix well with his kind there must be some underlying cause that caused the universal dislike to develop and finally to find expression.

"There is a reason, I thought, and I want to find it," said Snyder. He had walked down the path from the reptile house to the buffalo park in order, as he said, to take another look at the subject of his day's study. Leaning in a far corner in solitary state except for a little brindle nondescript pup that scampered about in evident enjoyment stood Jeams, rubbing one side against the wire fence and watching the other buffaloes on the other side of the inclosure.

"There he is," said Snyder, pointing toward the discontented Jeams. "They are giving him the absent treatment!"

The buffaloes know Snyder. As if to prove the truth of the strangeness of his story, when the group of animals caught sight of Snyder they began to move toward where he stood against the fence. As they started forward Jeams also noted his appearance and moved toward the same point. Jeams was approaching his companions all intent upon greeting Snyder when the others caught sight of him. Old Mrs. Long Beard apparently said as much to others, "There comes that objectionable young Jeams," for when Long Beard stopped, with head turned slightly away from the advancing Jeams, the others stopped, and then apparently with one accord they all turned and walked away. Jeams alone welcomed the keeper.

Snyder believes that among animals things happen just as they do among human beings and in pretty much the same way. Close study of the situation has led him to believe that Jeams in some way offended Mrs. Long Beard, who is a sort of social leader of the herd and whose dislike for the young buffalo is more pronounced than others of the family. Perhaps when Jeams first came he had a falling out with one of the younger members of the Long Beard family, and the old cow has never forgiven him for what she considered an insult. Being of some social standing, she passed the word along that "that young Jeams is not in our set."

This is the way Snyder, at least, has reasoned it out, and having behind him years of close association with buffaloes and other animals and being not only an animal student, but animal lover, Snyder is entitled to h's opinion.

The hazing Jeams received would have driven him mad, so Snyder says, had it not been for the friendship that sprung up between him and the yellow dog. This dog, though of some education, totally ignored the notices placed so all the dogs can read it, "Dogs at large not allowed in this park," and entered the Zoological Park. Several times the keepers chased him out, but each time he came back. Jeams and the dog just naturally hit it off together, as Snyder expresses it. They have been fast friends for some time now, and Jeams does not seem to resent as acutely as formerly the silent treatment of his companions. Jeams has also told the dog all about the trouble, for the dog cannot tolerate the other members of the herd. At least that is what Keeper Snyder says Jeams has told him.

And Snyder is a truthful student of animal life.

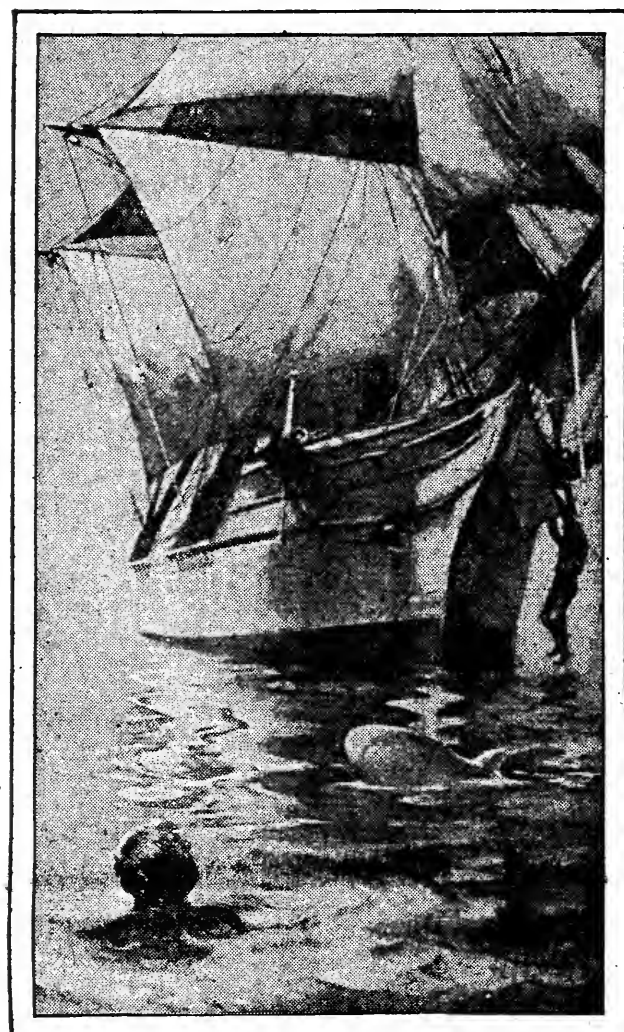
HAS GREATEST OF SEA MYSTERIES BEEN SOLVED AT LAST?

Remarkable Document Left in the Care of an English Head Master Tells a Story That If True Would Clear Up the Fate of the Marie Celeste, Which Has Puzzled the World for Nearly Fifty Years.



"A huge shark shot out from the port side of the ship" got across the Atlantic that year autumn with as little damage as the Mary Celeste. It was not only the exterior that was good. The accommodation. Everyone on first joining her was struck by the comfort of the foc's'le the light was better by day and by night, there seemed more ventilation and the bunks were wider and longer than usual which to a tall man (as myself) was a very pleasant discovery

What Has Hitherto Been Known of the Fate of the Marie Celeste.

In the Autumn of 1872 a brig called the Marie Celeste left New York, bound for Genoa. Several weeks passed; then the owner received a notice from the United States Consul at Gibraltar as follows:

The American brig Marie Celeste of New York was brought into this port by the British barque Dei Gratia. Marie Celeste picked up on high seas on Dec. 5, abandoned. Brig in perfect condition, but was taken possession of by Admiralty Court as a derelict. Fate of crew unknown.

It appears that Capt. Boyce of the Dei Gratia, when he found himself within hailing distance of the brig, remarked to his mate, Adams, that there seemed to be something amiss with the vessel, and as she drifted closer they noticed that not a soul was in sight on her decks!

Forthwith the urgent hoist was run up. Still no reply. On the calm sea a boat, manned by two sailors, and carrying both Captain and mate from the Dei Gratia, pulled toward the strange brig. The two Britons then made their way aft, noting the ship's condition as they went; but not a thing appeared to be missing. The two men searched, but not a human being, dead or alive, could they find. There had evidently been no mutiny, as there were no signs of a struggle; nor was it piracy, as the money box had not been disturbed and the valuable cargo was untouched.

A thorough search by the two British sailors revealed some startling disclosures. A sewing machine was found and a thimble lying on its side on a corner of the machine, which proved that there could have been no recent storm. The article the woman was sewing appeared to be like a child's pinafore. The woman had stopped sewing in the middle of stitching a sleeve. The appearance of the table showed that four persons had risen from a half-eaten meal to leave the cabin forever. The child had almost finished her porridge. By the Captain's place at the table lay two halves of a hard-boiled egg in the shell. At another place at the table stood a bottle filled with a popular brand of cough medicine. The cork lay on the cloth as evidence that there had been nothing but a calm sea. In the mate's cabin were found two watches on the table. In the forecastle, too, pans on the stove contained a breakfast ready cooked, showing that the sailors were about to gather for the morning meal when they went over the side instead. There were no signs of any preparations for abandoning the ship; but that, on the contrary, all hands had left in a great hurry, on the spur of the moment, was shown by the fact that they had washed their underclothing before breakfast on the morning of the desertion, as it was hanging on a line over the forecastle.

The ship's log, which was found on board, was entered up to November 24th—that is, some ten days before the vessel was encountered by the Dei Gratia.

While the binnacle and compass of the vessel were found, the chronometer was missing. Absolutely not another thing—so far as the two men could see—was missing from the brig except the ship's papers. The sailors had not even stopped to take their pipes or tobacco, while, more curious still, no boat was missing.

THE greatest mystery of the sea is that of the Marie Celeste. For more than forty years all kinds of ingenious solutions have been offered, and now comes what purports to be the real story told by the sole survivor.

It will appear in the December number of The Strand Magazine, to which publication it was sent by A. Howard Linford, the head master of Peterborough Lodge — Hampstead's largest preparatory school. Mr. Linford's attention was attracted by an article in an earlier issue of the magazine retelling the story of the mystery, and he made some researches which have resulted in this article, which is printed here by permission of The Strand.

Omitting The Strand's introductory remarks, the article is as follows:

Mr. Linford is well known in the scholastic world as a man who has fought hard for the better teaching of mathematics and English to the young as being the essentials of a scientific training. He has met his just reward by the successes of his pupils in the public schools. When King Edward VII. opened the New Speech Room at Rugby it was to a former pupil of Mr. Linford's that his Majesty handed the gold medal for English. The Shakespeare prizes last year and this year at Harrow and Westminster went to other old boys, as did also both gold medals for mathematics. The mathematical scholarships gained by his boys are probably more numerous than those of any other preparatory school in England, and he numbers among his pupils the sons of some of the most distinguished scientists of England and France.

With these few preliminary remarks we leave the letter and document to speak for themselves. This is Mr. Linford's letter:

Sir—A friend has brought to my notice your article on the Marie Celeste. When I read it the name struck a familiar chord, but I was some days before I could remember under what circumstances I had heard it. At last, however, I recalled an old servant, Abel Fosdyk, committing to my charge, on his deathbed, a quantity of papers contained in three boxes; among these he told me would be found the account of [the] Mary Celeste. I suppose he said "the," but I had at the time no notion of what Mary Celeste meant, and imagined it was a woman. I paid but little heed, and merely sent the boxes away to a safe keeping, not anticipating they would ever be opened again. Before commenting on the matter I would like to emphasize the fact that I do not vouch for the truth of anything narrated. No word on the subject was ever mentioned by the writer to me. But the fact that for thirty years he kept not only a diary but also a set of shrewd observations on all that passed, and wrote much and well without our knowing anything of what he was doing, shows him to have been a man of exceptional reticence and self-control.

As for the document, I would rather let it speak for itself; but at the same time I must confess I have been greatly impressed by the following facts: A brig called Marie Celeste, sailing under Capt. Griggs, is under discussion. I find an account of a brigantine named Mary Celeste, sailing under a Capt. Briggs. By your courtesy I have now seen the official report, and find in every instance the papers in my possession are correct. Further, the official papers mention a peculiar damage to the bows and two square cuts on the outside. This, I think, has never till now been made public, yet here again the papers I send you enter most minutely into this alteration of the bows. Finally I find, on inquiry, that the Autumn of 1872 was famous for its extraordinary storms in the Atlantic, so much so that a leading article in The Times likens it to the period of storms so well known to have prevailed at Cromwell's death. One can easily imagine a Captain, working day and night in such conditions, going gradually out of his mind.

Of course, minute errors will always creep in when relating facts a long time after their occurrence. It is evident to me these facts were written down nearly twenty years after they happened, and no one knows better than myself how easily dates may be forgotten or the sequence of events confused.

I now leave the MS. in your hands.

The writer also left a photograph of a little girl, wrapped in a piece of paper, on which it is still possible to decipher, in faded pencil writing, the words, "Baby at the age of two years." The interest and significance of this portrait, which we reproduce, require no comment.

Abel Fosdyk's Story.

It was in the early Autumn of 1872 that the Mary Celeste sailed out of New York for Europe. She was as smart a brigantine as one could wish to see, and looked as new as if she had just come out of the maker's hands. We were bound for Genoa with a cargo of spirits, and I think I might say that no boat of her size—about six hundred tons—got across the Atlantic that Autumn with as little damage as the Mary Celeste. Curiously, I had intended this to be my last voyage in her, though not owing to the reasons which necessitated my secreting myself later, but because my sister—my only relative—had just died and I did not wish to return to America for some time. I had also another and more private reason.

[The ship is called in the official records the Marie Celeste, the Mary Celeste, and sometimes simple the Celeste]

[No doubt these reasons for secrecy at the time were also those which caused him to keep silence after the disaster.]

The party aboard consisted of ten men besides the captain and mate, and, in addition, we carried two passengers in the cabin—viz., the captain's wife, Mrs. Briggs, and "Baby," their little girl.

[The Captain's name is given in our original account as Griggs. It appears, however, from the official report that his name was Briggs, so that the present writer is quite accurate. It appears, also, from other papers left by the writer, that he was engaged rather as a steward than as a sailor, his special duty being to attend on the Captain's wife, who was in ill-health.]

Though well beyond those years which would have justified the name, she never went by any other, so far as I can remember. Moreover, she gave me (or rather her mother did) a portrait of herself taken when she was 2 years old, and so natural did it seem to think of her as "Baby" that that is the only name written on the back of the picture by myself. I fancy Baby was about 7 or 8 years old.

Members of Ship's Company.

The crew were, I think, as follows, taking the fo'c's'le as a starting point: Joe, who was ship's carpenter, had the bunk above me, and Robin, so called, I believe, because he had a curious red-fronted jersey, in the next to me, while Fred and Ginger—whose real name, I fancy, was Odell—and the boy had the three corresponding on the opposite side. In the cross bunks there was Darky, a nigger youth, who, I rather think, was a stowaway. At any rate, I quite well remember Capt. Briggs, who evidently was under the impression we were thirteen on board, whereas we were fourteen, saying to the man at the wheel (I think it was the elder Williamson): "If I hear any more nonsense about thirteen being an unlucky number, I'll jolly well knock your head off, and then we shall be twelve. Besides Darky, there was Ned Clark, a man with a bushy beard, and the other two bunks were occupied by the two Williamsons, father and son, who were generally known as Big Bill and Little Bill.

For the first few days the sea was smooth, and, with a west wind blowing, we got over quite a lot of ground. But on about the fifth day out the wind freshened and gradually increased to a gale, which lasted four days and nights. The ship rode it out splendidly, but for all that the Captain did not spare himself and seemed to be incessantly on deck. Both his wife and the mate implored him to take more rest, but he would not listen to them. It was a pity, for there was a great trial in front of him which needed all his strength. After a few days of better weather we suddenly entered a region of squalls and gales which seemed endless.

However, the ship was perfect; practically no damage of any sort or kind had been done—at any rate, nothing that could not be mended or readjusted by ourselves. But one alteration, and that a very serious one, had taken place. The strain upon the Captain had been too great. Almost without sleep throughout the time, his nerves had got into such a state that he was now so irritable one scarcely dared approach him.

As luck would have it we now came into calmer weather, and as if no happy mean could be found we were, for a day or two, almost becalmed. The weather turned suddenly fine and warm, with a very slight wind from the south. And at this point an interesting event happened. I was coming one day from the galley to the cabin, and had just reached the skylight, when I had my attention attracted by the Captain, who was at that moment at the wheel. His mouth was open and his eyes looked as though they would start out of his head.

"Good God! Look there!" he cried.

Instinctively I turned round to see what the object could possibly be which had caused such an extraordinary look of panic on the Captain's face. I think, for the moment, something in the nature of the sea serpent presented itself to my mind, but, instead, I saw quite another sight, but, nevertheless, one which was warranted to bring one's heart into one's mouth, for there, on the bowsprit, without holding on to anything, stood Baby. Quick as thought I put the tray down on the skylight and silently—for I had no shoes on—I flew to the bows and, leaning well forward, I grasped the child's frock.

"Darling," I said, "you must not go there; you might fall in."

The Captain, who had called somebody to the wheel, then came up. Passionately fond of his little girl as I am sure he was, he, nevertheless, stormed at her and, working himself up into a perfect rage, boxed her ears soundly and sent her, crying her eyes out, below. I saw that the Captain was not himself and wondered what was going to happen.

"Baby's Quarter Deck."

The incident, however, led to one definite result. No doubt the Captain was truly sorry he had hit his little girl, and by way of making amends he ordered the carpenter to fit up a little barricade by the bowsprit, which should be quite safe for her to sit on in fine weather. We all took great interest in the construction, for Baby was a great favorite of us all, and an especial one of mine, having myself been always very fond of children. The groundwork was, I think, an old door or top of a trestle table. It had another similar one screwed on to it underneath. On three sides—that is, one long side and the two short—a kind of rough balustrade was made about the height of an ordinary table, and a rail ran along the top. This was hoisted on the bows and rested at the same time on the two sides of the ship and on the bowsprit. In order to make the gap safe between the sides and the ship a slanting rail or two was put on each side. Further, a step was put below, and on the top a small barrel was placed for a seat. This platform was always called "Baby's quarter deck." Here she would sit and croon little songs, or walk to and fro and call out: "Ship on the port bow." This was the only expression I ever heard her use, and she used it quite irrespective of any ship being visible or not.

Much Wild Weather.

At last the fine spell of weather ended and we were once more in the midst of gales—if anything even worse than before. One could scarcely believe the sky could hold so much rain. Fortunately, however, we still had one advantage of the gales—the wind was always behind us. What we should have done with contrary winds I cannot think. Those only who have tried it can realize what it is to do long tacks in an Atlantic gale when one is frequently broadside on to the mountainous sea for considerable stretches. As it was, we got a bit out of our course, and the Captain, whose irritability had now got to such a pass that he seemed almost mad, could scarcely contain himself when the lookout called: "Land on the starboard bow." The mate went up aloft to examine, and came down, saying it must be Porto Santo.

"Porto Santo, you idiot!" said the Captain. "Don't you know the difference between the Azores and Madeira? Porto Santo, indeed! Why don't you say the Canaries or the Cape Verde Islands at once?"

"All right, Captain, have it your way," answered the mate, who had learned by experience that contradiction these days to the Captain was like a red rag to a bull.

Whether it was Porto Santo or not I never learned, but one thing was quite evident to us all: Capt. Briggs was in such a state of nervous breakdown that no owner would have intrusted his ship to him for five minutes. Early in the afternoon of that very day he went up to the mate and, after saying a few words which I did not hear, though he stood not far off, he suddenly began to cry, just like a little child. He sat down on the skylight and sobbed, with his face buried in his hands. The mate persuaded him to go below, where Mrs. Briggs got him to lie down. I know occasionally one will see a drunken man get into a maudlin state of tears, but the Captain was a very sober man, as we all knew, so there was no explanation except a real breakdown.

The mate was a very capable man and could manage the ship all right, so there was nothing to fear. At the same time we were all a bit upset by the old man's state. He was what everybody would call a strong man, the very last in the world that one would expect to do such a thing as cry. Perhaps if he had continued to rest all would have been well; but no, there he was next day, pacing the deck just like a wild animal in a cage. We gave him a wide berth each of us, expecting to hear some wild order given sooner or later.

Becalmed in the Heat.

After about two or three days we again got into a region of calm, and this time were for some hours actually becalmed. The sails lazily flapped and the booms swung uneasily to and fro. The sea still heaved as though in a deep slumber, and the weather was quite hot. One would have said it was mid-Summer and that we were in the tropics. This state of affairs continued on and off for about half a week, a slight breeze occasionally moving us for an hour or two and dropping again.

And now it was that we came to the final catastrophe.

It arose out of some conversation of which, unfortunately, I did not hear the beginning, but of which I heard sufficient to form a good idea of what the beginning was. As, however, I am most anxious not to let any ideas of my own appear, I will report each detail as I saw it and heard it with my own eyes and ears, contenting myself with making one preliminary remark only. Once during the voyage I had heard some sneering remarks by the Captain to the mate about his not having, on some occasion, entered the water to save a comrade.

I went down into the cabin to fetch the basin which Baby used for her porridge. Mrs. Briggs had used it for some posset the night before for herself. She came out and gave it to me, and at the same time asked me to get her a can of hot water. I took the basin and brought down about half a pail of warm water. I remember putting a cruet on the table and also one plate, which had evidently had nothing but bread on it and was lying on a locker. I went up again, and in something less than half an hour returned with Baby's porridge, some bacon, and two or three bits off a knuckle of ham; I cannot call them slices so much as pickings, as there was very little left on the bone. On entering the cabin I saw at once the Captain was again in his strange, irritable, and also irritating mood, and bent on quarrelling with somebody.

"It's no good, Harry," I heard him say as I entered. "If you were to talk from now till doomsday you would never make me say it wasn't a cowardly action."

"You needn't be so free with the word 'coward,'" replied the mate. "It isn't a pleasant one, and you seem to have forgotten, as I told you before, I was fully dressed and in all my clothes, and though one can keep afloat and move a bit, one can't really swim

ZELAYA BLAMES DOLLAR DIPLOMACY FOR HIS TROUBLES

Exiled President of Nicaragua, Now Here, Says American "Big Business" Is Really Forcing an Unacceptable Government on His Country.

By George MacAdam.

THAT dollar diplomacy—a sinister dollar diplomacy—is forcing an unacceptable government on Nicaragua; that an American landing force in Managua is maintaining in office a President who is merely the ready tool of certain American "big business" interests: this is the substance of a talk I had yesterday with that very interesting person, the exiled President of the Central American Republic, Gen. José Santos Zelaya.

From a number of viewpoints it was an illuminating talk. For one thing, it threw a ray of light on that matter of perplexity to the Anglo-Saxon mind—the Latin-American revolution. The listener was inevitably led to the conclusion that in the countries about the Caribbean Sea it is only a "strong man" in the Presidential chair who can maintain anything approaching civic equilibrium. It would seem that these countries are by temperament and training unfit for a republican form of government, that to maintain it in them is only to maintain a humbug, and that the best thing for them under existing conditions is beneficent dictatorship.

But the listener was also led to a further conclusion, a conclusion not so auspicious to our pride of nationality. This is that in the mind of the Latin-American the friendliness or unfriendliness of the Government at Washington is largely a question as to whether or not concessions are granted to certain favored interests.

That this is the mental attitude of Latin-America was judged not only by the direct charges that Gen. Zelaya made, but also by his indirect remarks, his interjections, his exclamations—the things that cannot be retold to a third person, yet which are most significant in a conversation as indicative of the real thought in the speaker's mind.

Just before I went to see Gen. Zelaya an American who has lived through enough Latin American history to know whereof he speaks said to me:

"Whatever else he may be, of one thing you can be certain, the person who has succeeded in governing a Caribbean republic for sixteen years is ALL MAN."

This statement, so much at variance with the pictures of South and Central American officials presented by fiction writers, was indorsed by Gen. Zelaya's appearance the moment I entered his apartment at the Waldorf-Astoria; it takes no second glance, no scrutiny, to see that he is a man of courage, a man of action, a man who has been commissioned by Nature a leader of men.

Eyes, chin and mouth, the set of head and shoulders, but particularly his eyes, all fit into one's preconceived mental picture of a dictator. He looks as though he would be equally at home in Presidential chair or cavalry saddle, as though he could sign a death warrant between dinner courses without any interference with his digestion.

An Obstacle Smasher.

And yet there is no suggestion in his personality of brutality. A polished, educated gentleman, suave of speech, courtly in manner, he is simply one of the "strong men," one of that type—and it includes many of our own Money Magnates—that obliterates "obstacles" with superman indifference.

Gen. Zelaya understands English, speaking it slowly but without hesitation. In the rapid interchange of conversation, however, he preferred to rely upon his Secretary, Mr. Macias, as translator. And it was only when he wished to give emphasis to some remark that he addressed me directly in English.

What I particularly wished him to talk about was whether or not the dictator is a necessity in Latin-American political life—a question that, with the Mexican puzzle crying for solution, is of paramount interest just now. But the General declined to admit dictatorship.

"We have in Nicaragua, just as you have here, the executive, the legislative, and the judicial branches of the National Government. I was only the executive."

It may not be out of place to say here that a little later in his talk he labeled the legislative and the judicial branches of the Nicaraguan Government as they are conducted in the present administration of President Adolfo Diaz, "humbugs" and "farces." It is expert testimony as to what can be done with these co-ordinate branches of a constitutional republic in the tropic zone.

"Perhaps the word 'dictator' is offensive," I suggested, and the suggestion seemed to meet with approval. "Then let me ask if the 'strong man' is needed in Latin-American politics?"

"If by 'strong' you mean the man who has a definite policy and who can carry it through with determination, I answer you, 'yes.'"

Realizing that an ex-dictator is unlikely to confess his past dictatorship, I resorted to an indirect question. Like the previous questions, it was addressed to Gen. Zelaya via Mr. Macias.

"Isn't it true that Gen. Zelaya went to school under Barrios?"

Government by Bullet.

For those who have forgotten their Central American history, it may be said that Gen. Rufino Barrios, President of Guatemala from 1871 to 1884, is spoken of as the first of the stern Liberal rulers of the Porfirio Diaz type. No country was ever more completely organized under a military rule than was Guatemala at that time. Barrios began his Presidency by having a dozen disturbers of the public peace and security taken out in the public plaza and shot. The country enjoyed peace and prosperity under him.

But now to return to the interview. Gen. Zelaya caught the name of his old commander, and his face lighted up.

"Ah! Gen. Barrios!" he repeated. "A great man!"

Having delivered himself of this sentiment in English, Gen. Zelaya began a long conversation with Mr. Macias. At last the latter turned to me:

"He says that his father was one of the most prominent men in Nicaragua, a rich coffee planter, active in the Liberal Party. Gen. Zelaya himself—he was not General then—was Alcalde—what you call Mayor—in Managua. It was a good chance. A land question came up and he took the part of the people against the Conservative Party, which was in authority.

"The Government saw what a power Zelaya had over the people and feared him. He was exiled. That was in 1884.

"It was a little time after this that Gen. Barrios organized his great army and endeavored to make a reality of what had always been and still is the dream of all the Liberals in Central America—a unification of the five small republics into one United States of Central America.

"The exiled Zelaya enlisted with Barrios, being appointed a Lieutenant. Barrios fell upon the plains of Chalchuapa, mortally wounded, in the very act of leading his army to victory. The whole dream was dissipated. Zelaya remained out of his country in exile."

"Barrios was a strong man, was he not?" I asked.

"Yes, a very strong man. Where there was opposition he put it down quickly."

"Is it true that Barrios began his Presidency by shooting twelve men in the public plaza?"

Mr. Macias translated this question to Gen. Zelaya and another long talk ensued. Finally:

"The General says there's a lot of exaggeration about Barrios. He had opposition, and he was—he was—energetic."

I repeated my question: "Did Gen. Zelaya go to school under Barrios?"

The question was translated and Gen. Zelaya burst into laughter. "No, no," he exclaimed. Then through Mr. Macias: "Gen. Zelaya had a lot of enemies, but he pardoned them."

"Was it a mistake?"

From Gen. Zelaya himself: "Perhaps." A shrug of the shoulders, and then an eloquent "I am here."

There was some more talk with Mr. Macias, and then the latter translated:

"Gen. Zelaya went back to Nicaragua, when he was allowed to, which was toward the end of 1885. He devoted himself to coffee raising. It was eight years later that the revolution occurred that put him in power. There had been two Presidents during those eight years, Carazo and Sacasa.

"You see, Sacasa was a Conservative, but it was the Conservative Party that started the revolution. It was over a local question, and the trouble was begun by the eastern wing of the party. That gave the Liberal Party its advantage, and it put Zelaya in.

"After that the Conservative Party continually endeavored to overthrow Zelaya, but did not succeed until it got aid from Guatemala, Estrada, and the United States."

Here followed much talk between Gen. Zelaya and Mr. Macias, in which the word "concessions" constantly recurred.

"The thing happened like this," said Mr. Macias, finally addressing me. "They wanted Gen. Zelaya to make some concessions—yes, it was Americans that wanted them. During all the years that he was President before this, all things were all right, because he gave all foreigners all hospitality and protection. It must be noted that the Americans got the best concessions, but they still wanted more."

"What concessions had they obtained?"

Gen. Zelaya counted on his fingers.

"They got concessions of land, the right to cut timber, concessions for mines, navigation of rivers, rubber plantations, banana plantations—they got all the things from which the wealth of that country comes," said Mr. Macias, interpreting.

"The final trouble over the concessions that the Americans wanted came about in this way. The company that had the biggest concession of all, that of cutting down timber on the Atlantic Coast, did not accomplish what they had agreed to, and furthermore they violated the laws of Nicaragua by importing contraband. The case was carried to court and the American company was condemned by every tribunal. In spite of this decision of our courts, it was then agreed to submit the matter to arbitration, one American and one Englishman being chosen as arbitrators. Both gave their verdict in keeping with the findings of the Nicaraguan courts."

Gen. Zelaya here took up the story himself.

"Mr. Knox, your Secretary of State," he said, speaking slowly and emphatically, "created the difficulty in this way. He said the matter must be referred to The Hague Tribunal. That meant great expense for Nicaragua, and besides the question was not an international matter. The Nicaraguan Government decided to pay the American company, as it wanted to keep on friendly terms with the United States Government."

Plenty of Desires.

"It was Gen. Zelaya," interjected Mr. Macias, "who paid this money. It was paid from his own resources.

"And now we come to the further concessions that the American company insisted on. It wanted land concessions that were not in accordance with the laws of Nicaragua. It wanted to make a loan to Nicaragua with the right to take the receipts of the Custom Houses as a guarantee. It also wanted the right to land sailors and marines from United States warships if in its own discretion it decided that that course was desirable.

"Gen. Zelaya could not grant these demands. It would have been against the sovereignty of his country. In refusing, he was simply defending the rights of his nation, and that partly accounts for his popularity.

"The President of Guatemala being known as an enemy of Zelaya, the moving spirits in the American company went to him and induced him, without much trouble, perhaps, to foment a revolution. Gen. Zelaya had appointed Gen. Juan Estrada Governor of the Atlantic Coast. He turned traitor to Gen. Zelaya at the instigation of the President of Guatemala, and started a revolution.

"It was soon manifest that America's active sympathy was with Estrada. At Bluefields Gen. Zelaya had 3,000 troops with which he could easily have crushed Estrada's army of 1,500 men, but American bluejackets and marines were landed with cannon and machine guns."

In reply to my question Gen. Zelaya said gravely and without heat:

"Yes, the American force was smaller than my army, and I could have beaten it had I engaged it in battle. But I knew that after them would come more and more. For me to start a war with the United States would be simply—" He did not finish the sentence, but for lack of a word to express the extreme folly of such a course he made an eloquent wave of the arm. "At the same time the United States sent a warship to Corinto and landed marines on an island facing that city. The United States was pressing me from all sides, and to save my country I resigned. I sent this cablegram to President Taft:

President Taft, Washington:

On Dec. 4 I sent the following cablegram to Gonzales: "Inform Secretary Knox that I believe his sources of information are prejudiced. I request that the United States send a disinterested commission to investigate, and if findings show that my administration is detrimental to Central America I will resign." I have received no reply. In order to avoid harm to my country, and desiring to place it in a position to renew friendly relations with the United States, I have to-day sent my resignation to Congress. As my opponents might consider my presence a disturbing factor, I propose to show my good faith by leaving Nicaragua and stand ready to account for my acts before any proper tribunal.

PRESIDENT ZELAYA.

Mr. Macias here continued the story: "The Nicaraguan Congress elected Madriz the successor of Zelaya. He was well known and had acted for Nicaragua in Washington. He was recognized as President by all the world with the exception of the United States.

"Estrada wanted the Presidency and it was plain that the Government at Washington wanted him to have it, too. Madriz saw that with the American backing that the revolution maintained by Estrada had, he could not hope to hold the Presidency. He resigned and left the country. He went to Mexico, where he died of sorrow.

"Then came Dawson, the confidential agent of the American Government. Dawson and five revolutionists of the Estrada party met and agreed that Estrada should remain in power for two years, and that after that there should be an election in the country, but only one of the five signers of the pact should be eligible for election."

Gen. Zelaya here broke into satirical laughter. "Is it not a scandal?" he asked. "No matter if the people wanted to elect some one else they could not do it. It is written down."

"After that," said Mr. Macias, again taking up the story, "there came trouble between Mena, one of the signers of the pact, then Minister of War, and Estrada. Mena, having control of the War Department, had the arms and ammunition. Faced with this, Estrada did not feel strong enough to hold the Presidency and he left the country.

"The Presidency was taken by Adolfo Diaz to fill out the term of Estrada. Diaz is still in office. He has given all the concessions that the Americans want. He has gone so far as to say that he does not care for Nicaragua; that he does not feel himself a Nicaraguan.

"Diaz can take this position because through his concessions he has allowed the Americans to take possession of the Custom Houses, the banks, and the railways, to take over the right of taxing tobacco and alcohol—in fact, he has given to the American company, in exchange for a loan, all the revenues of the Government. The American company is in fact the Government of Nicaragua. Under the administration of Diaz the legislative and judicial branches of the Government are just humbugs, farces.

"Diaz is regarded by Nicaraguans as a man who has sold his country. He would not be tolerated a day were it not for the American marines who with their rifles and machine guns are in Managua.

"The result of all this is that Nicaragua is to-day in a very bad condition. Industrially it is dead. Just compare this with its condition during the years that Zelaya was President. In his time the English bondholders said: 'Nicaragua is a small country, but it is honorable.' Nicaraguan bonds were then higher than the bonds of any other Latin-American country."

Rules of Revolution.

"But Zelaya had revolutions to contend with, did he not?"

"Yes, there were many attempts at revolution, but only one that was serious. You see, for revolution to succeed it must be popular. Zelaya had the people with him. Why, he always went around Nicaragua alone. He depended on the love of his people."

"There is something that the citizen of the United States cannot understand about your Latin-American countries," I suggested, "and that is the frequency of your revolutions."

"Ah, you see it is this way. You are more cold blooded. You can wait in peace. We are not like that. We see a chance. If we do not take the chance when it comes we lose it, perhaps forever."

In closing the interview Gen. Zelaya said very earnestly:

"The world knows that President Wilson has a strong sense of justice, and we hope that when the matter is brought to his attention he will investigate with the same effort at fairness and impartiality that he is now displaying in Mexico. This is all we ask."

HAS GREATEST OF SEA MYSTERIES BEEN SOLVED AT LAST?

in one's clothes; not really to call it swimming, that is—"

"What!" shouted the Captain. "You mean to say a man can't swim in his clothes?"

That remark was repeated by the Captain partly in answer to the mate's remarks and partly in talking to himself for several minutes, somewhat after the following style:

"Not an ordinary man can't," repeated the mate.

"A—man—can't — swim — in—his—clothes!" said very slowly, as if to himself.

"You mustn't judge by yourself; you're an exceptional swimmer. There aren't many that can swim like you."

"So—a—man—can't—swim—in—his clothes—hey?"

"You know what I mean—generally speaking, a person who can swim in the ordinary way, or—"

Still very slowly and very deliberately, as if abstractedly, he answered, "I'm — not — going —to — have—my—breakfast—yet."

"Why not, pray?"

"I'm going to have a swim in my clothes."

"Besides," put in the mate, "you've got on a good suit of clothes. Where's the sense in spoiling them? If it had been me it wouldn't have mattered, because I'm going to chuck these slops overboard when we get in."

It was an unfortunate sentence.

"Very well—now look here, Harry," said the Captain. "We'll change clothes, and I'll give you a new suit if I don't get around in five minutes. Now, that's fair, isn't it?"

"I think it's a great pity that you are thinking of doing it," said the mate, who, I could see, was most anxious to prevent such folly.

To my surprise, Capt. Briggs then took off his coat and waistcoat and flung them on the locker. The mate took off his watch and chain and put them on the table, at the same time undoing his waistcoat.

"Anyway," said Mrs. Briggs, "Harry's not going to undress in front of me, if you are."

"All right, Harry; you go and change in your cabin," said the Captain. "Here are the trousers—Abel, you go with him and bring me his things. I believe a dip in the sea is just the very thing to brace me up and put me all right. I've been feeling seedy for days."

The mate took up his watch and chain and I followed with the Captain's coat and waistcoat. As we entered the cabin the Captain's watch dropped out of the pocket of his waistcoat, which I had been holding across my left arm. I picked it up and put it on the table alongside of the mate's. The mate changed and did not speak a word. I could see he was worried, but I did not dare to say anything. By the time I got back with the mate's things Mrs. Briggs and Baby had left the cabin. I did not know where they had gone, but I saw Baby had not finished her porridge. I asked the Captain if I should take it to keep hot. He did not answer for some seconds; he then merely remarked, "I'll show them whether a man can swim in his clothes or not."

"Yes, Sir; certainly, Sir," I said, and went out. My heart was heavy within me, for I had always been fond of Capt. Briggs. He had been a good master to me, and I, like all the others, had watched him with awe, amounting almost to reverence and affection, managing the boat and protecting our lives with such masterful precision that it made him appear to us to be something above the ordinary mortal. And now his mind was undoubtedly unhinged for a time. He had been behaving like a wayward child—delighted to make trouble, and obstinate with the obstinacy of the mad. There was nothing very wonderful in his swimming, of course—he was known to be an excellent swimmer; indeed, his vanity in that matter was one of the few weak points in his nature. It certainly was not his fault if everybody on the ship did not know that when he was at school he had won three swimming prizes, three years running. I have not the smallest doubt in my own mind that for some days the Captain had not been right in his head, and now he seemed to have gone a stage farther in mental derangement than he had hitherto shown signs of. However, when I got on deck I saw a knot of men standing round Mrs. Briggs and Baby just in front of the fo'c'sle.

"Abel," she said, as I came up, "can you swim?"

I told her I could a little, but I didn't think I could in my clothes. I had a notion she was trying to get somebody else to do it, and so prevent the Captain. But it was not so. Her plan was to insist on at least a couple of men accompanying him. "You know," she said to us all, "he's not well, and he might get cramp or anything." We reassured her by saying he was a wonderful swimmer and it would be nothing to him, but all the same Young Bill and Joe the carpenter offered to go round with him.

A knotted rope was now fastened on to Baby's quarter deck for the Captain to go down by, but before going he turned to Big Bill and said: "Run down and get my watch, Bill." I never thought at the moment that the Captain's watch was in the mate's cabin, but as Bill did not come back I remembered it and ran off to tell him. However, I met him just coming up the companion with the chronometer in his hand, and he ran along with it.

Fred was at the wheel, or rather, standing near it. We had taken in a little sail and heaved to. About half way up the ship on the starboard side was Ginger, lighting a pipe. In the water were Young Bill and Joe waiting for the Captain Darky and Robin were below. I did not at that moment know why, but soon saw that they had been taking off some of their things to have a swim also. Mrs. Briggs sat on the barrel on the quarter-deck, looking the picture of misery, and Baby was leaning over the rail of the same. The mate stood with his left foot on the bulwarks and his left hand holding the rigging, while his right foot was on the rail by Baby's arm. He was leaning with his elbow on his knee and, I think, speaking to Baby. The elder Bill and myself were both on Baby's quarter-deck. Clark was standing on the deck with his arms leaning on the quarter-deck, and the boy was standing beside him.

It was arranged that Baby should say "Go." The Captain leaned over and, taking the jibboom chains in his hand, hung from them. "Go," said Baby, and almost directly after Robin and Darky got over the side and plunged in. They kept close up to the bows, so as to help the Captain out, I suppose. I do not know if Mrs. Briggs had asked them to do this. The Captain did not have the slightest difficulty in getting along. We followed him with our eyes till he got to the stern, where he turned, and Ginger, who had followed him on the deck, called out: "He's round the corner," and soon after, when he had turned to come up the port side, came running with Fred to see the finish. We were all now, so far as I can tell, in the bows standing on Baby's quarter-deck, when suddenly a most unearthly shriek, which I am sure was Young Bill's voice, rent the air. We all leaned at once to the port side—and, without the slightest shadow of warning, found ourselves in the water!

I determined to get on my back and see if I could not regain a little breath, for I was nearly spent. I did this, and had good reason afterward to reflect on the wonderful truth of the words: "Where ignorance is bliss, 'twere folly to be wise." Having somewhat recovered myself, I turned again and said: "Now I will get back into the ship." Get back! But how? For the first time now I took stock of the situation. I had fallen in on the port side of the bow, and I was at the moment about thirty yards in front of the bowsprit and about ten yards out on the starboard side. The platform we had so long known as Baby's quarter-deck was dangling by one of its ends to the bowsprit, and Big Bill was hanging by both hands to the other end of it. His feet were a little clear of the water.

[The official report states: "It appears that both bows of the derelict had been recently cut by a sharp instrument." Can these marks have been left by the stays used to support the platform?]

What surprised me most was that not another soul was to be seen. Had they all got back, or where were they?

"Bill," I cried, "what's happened?"

His answer was, "You fool, there's a shark between the Captain and the ship!"

"Shark" is not a pleasant word to hear when you are in the water. Feebly I screamed out, "Help! Help!" where there was no help, and just then the platform came down right on the top of Bill. Almost immediately a huge shark shot out from the port side of the ship, swam rapidly toward me, passed me, and turned. Again it went down the port side and disappeared. Mad with fright, I struggled rather than swam to the platform on which Bill was already clinging. I grasped it and wriggled myself into a position of security, having the bar along the top under my two armpits, but, struggle as I would, I could not, for some time, get my knees on to it. At last I nearly upset it by getting a foot on and levering myself up.

I now noticed that Bill looked strange, and was moaning. I dared not move again for fear of upsetting the little craft, and, indeed, I had to lean well back to keep it balanced with Bill. I spoke to him, but he did not answer; nevertheless, he clung tenaciously to the edge and side. He was huddled up and lying upon his chest altogether in a very awkward attitude, while the end of one leg still dangled in the water. I could now see the whole of the starboard side of the ship, and I was horrified to find no rope or chain hanging down, so that even if we were to get alongside I did not see how we could get on board.

I do not think, up to this point, it had entered my head that nobody was left on the ship. It is difficult at this distance of time to speak with certainty, though I have so many times gone through these dreadful hours, both waking and in dreams, but I fancy my idea was that the Captain had the sole attention of those on the ship, and that they were trying to get to him. But now there was an ominous silence which attracted my attention for the first time. I heard no voice on the ship, no orders were given, no cheery, "Aye, aye, Sir," was audible. What if everybody was overboard, and there was no rope down anywhere to get back by!

[The men on the Dei Gratia gained the deck by means of the ship's chains, but these would be out of reach of a swimmer.]

But surely, I remembered, the mate had had hold of the rigging, and Ginger was, when I saw him last, not on the platform at all. Not for one moment did I realize or dream that nine people had been drowned in about three or four minutes.

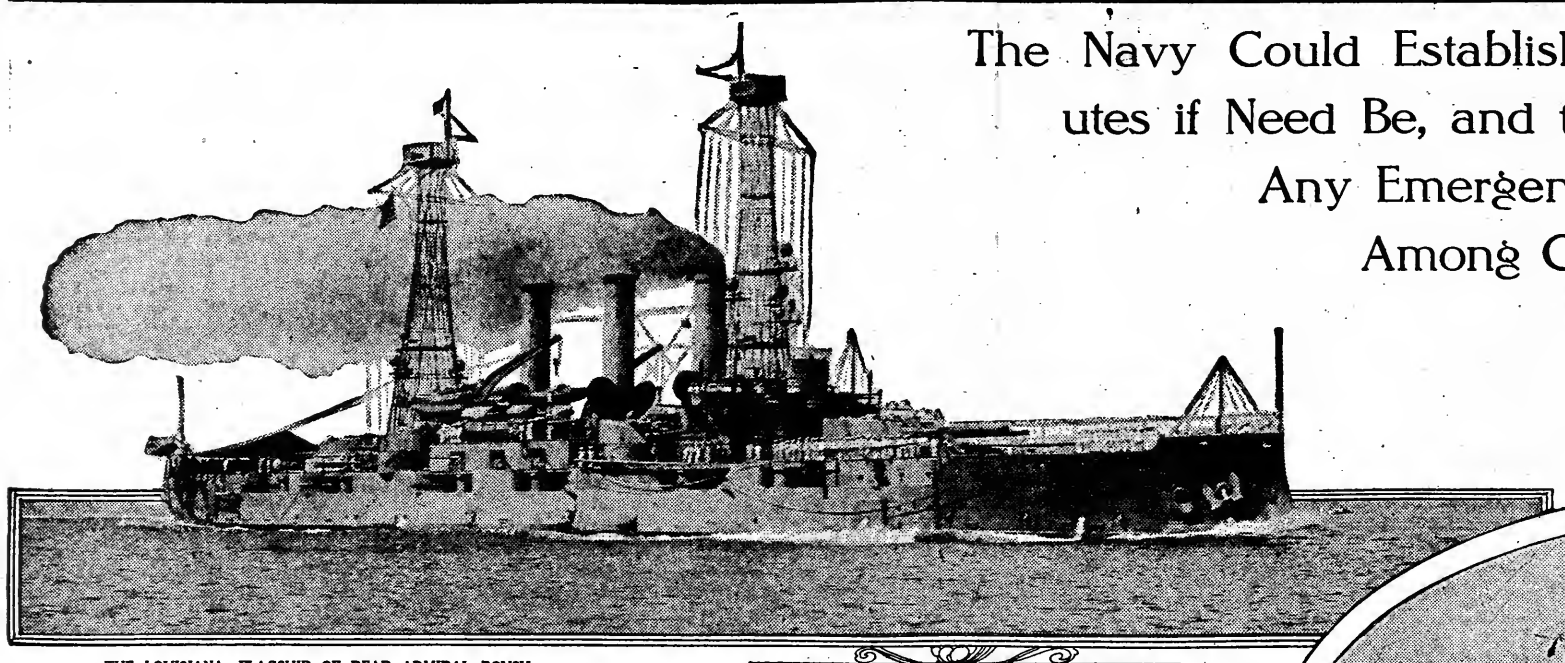
At last a very slight breeze arose and the ship turned lengthwise, and my heart beat wildly as I scanned the water and the starboard side of the vessel. At a glance I saw nothing was hanging down by which any one could get on board, but the idea came to me that if I could get alongside and stand up my full height on my frail platform I might be able, by the use of my fingers, to raise myself on ledges to the rigging fittings and so get aboard. Immediately, almost crying like a child at this sudden renewed hope, I tried to paddle the platform along, but after an exhausting effort I had only succeeded in turning the raft round on its axis. I could still see the dorsal fin of the shark moving quickly about just beyond the ship, and following its motions closely I at last discovered, to my unspeakable joy and also horror, the Captain's head.

I had, for some time, imagined that the poor fellow who was sharing my platform was dead, though his hand was still grasped round the edge of the plank; but towards evening he moved, sighed, and slipped into the water. Then, for the first time, I saw the other side of his face. The platform, in falling, had evidently caught him with the corner, and had literally cut his head right open from the right side of his forehead straight down his cheek, just escaping the eye and mouth. So wide did this wound now gape that I could see his teeth through the hole in his cheek. I saw, too, that the floor of the platform under where he had been lying was quite covered with blood, though I had not noticed it before. The body floated easily right in front of me, and I only found out some hours later that the end of the coat was caught in a nail which protruded. It floated at about an angle of thirty degrees with the surface of the water, the feet being uppermost and the head, thrown far back, being deepest in the water.

[The remainder of Fosdyk's story relates how he drifted around till he was picked up by a boat, and while interesting in itself gives no further light on the fate of the Marie Celeste.]

TROOPS AND FIGHTING SHIPS IN EASY REACH OF MEXICO

The Navy Could Establish a Blockade in a Few Minutes if Need Be, and the Army Is Prepared for Any Emergency—Who's Who Among Commanders.



THE LOUISIANA, FLAGSHIP OF REAR ADMIRAL BOUSH.

BEFORE the United States stands the possibility of having to blockade Mexico or to undertake armed intervention in that country's affairs. Minds of Americans are thus turning to the men and the ships that will be called on to do the work if possibility becomes actuality.

At the present moment there are enough troops on the border or within a day's run to close the northern boundary of Mexico, while off Vera Cruz and Tampico in the Atlantic, are two divisions of the Atlantic Fleet, and off Guaymas and Mazatlan on the western coast, waiting the signal to blockade, is the backbone of the Pacific Fleet. A blockade would be only a matter of minutes, or just as long as it would take the cable or the wireless to flash the order from the Executive offices of the President in Washington.

The navy would probably be the first of the united services to institute the blockade. Off Vera Cruz to-day, with steam up, guns pointed, officers and bluejackets and marines ready, is the dreadnought Michigan, with the first-line battleships Louisiana, Rhode Island, New Jersey, and Virginia, and the gunboats Tacoma and Wheeling. At anchor off Tampico are the battleships New Hampshire and Nebraska, with the fast flying scout cruiser Chester.

In addition there are within a week's sailing the dreadnought South Carolina, the battleships Georgia and Minnesota, and the superdreadnought North Dakota; the armored cruisers Tennessee, Washington, Montana and North Carolina, and the scout cruiser Salem; every battleship of the Atlantic reserve fleet, a whole fleet of naval auxiliaries and every gunboat and torpedo destroyer now in the North Atlantic.

Spoke for Washington.

In command of the vessels now on the scene is Rear Admiral Frank F. Fletcher, commanding the Second Division of the Atlantic Fleet. For months past he has been the naval mouthpiece of the Washington Government in matters pertaining to the patrol of the waters of the eastern coast of Mexico. Well-informed authorities declare that a better qualified officer than Admiral Fletcher to handle the delicate situation confronting him could not be found in the navy.

Rear Admiral Fletcher is an Iowan and was graduated from the Naval Academy at Annapolis with the class of 1875. He is a veteran of the Spanish War and has for years been known as one of the greatest ordnance authorities in the service as well as one of its most accomplished commanders. He has been in command on the east coast for nearly six months and is more familiar with the situation in Huerta's turbulent dominions than any other American officer of the service afloat.

His two starred pennant flutters from the foremast of the battleship Rhode Island, the three-funneled, super-imposed turreted fighter, to the wireless cabin of which ship will be flashed the order to blockade if that is the course determined upon by President Wilson.

The following are the ships that guard the east coast under the supreme command of Rear Admiral Fletcher, with the number of men on each, their commanders, and their present location:

AT VERA CRUZ.

New Hampshire, first line battleship of 16,000 tons; Capt. James H. Oliver, commanding, 49 officers and 906 men.

Rhode Island, first line battleship of 14,948 tons; flagship of Rear Admiral Frank F. Fletcher, commanding Second Division Atlantic Fleet; Capt. C. S. Williams, commanding; 49 officers and 856 men.

New Jersey, first line battleship of 14,948 tons; Capt. Frank K. Hill, commanding; 49 officers and 856 men.

Virginia, first line battleship and sister ship of the Rhode Island and New Jersey; Capt. John C. Leonard, commanding; 49 officers and 863 men.

Chester, scout cruiser of 3,750 tons; Commander William A. Moffett, commanding; 22 officers and 351 men.

Michigan, dreadnought of 16,000 tons; Capt. Edward C. Capehart, commanding; 49 officers and 756 men.

Tacoma, unarmored cruiser of 3,200 tons; Commander Nathan C. Twining, commanding; 78 officers and 279 men.

AT TUXPAN.

Louisiana, first line battleship of 16,000 tons; flagship of Rear Admiral Clifford J. Boush, commanding Fourth Division of the Atlantic Fleet; Capt. H. A. Field, commanding; 52 officers and 962 men.

AT TAMPICO.

Nebraska, first line battleship of 14,948 tons; Capt. Spencer S. Wood, commanding; 49 officers and 837 men.

Wheeling, gunboat of 900 tons; Commander S. E. W. Kittelle, commanding; 8 officers and 155 men.

Any one of the seven battleships named is three times as powerful as the entire so-called navy of Mexico. The total tonnage of the organization is 115,732, while the thirty-two 12-inch guns in the main batteries of the seven can hurl in a single broadside 12-inch projectiles totaling in weight approximately 28,000 pounds.

Off the Pacific Coast of Mexico and under command of Rear Admiral Walter C. Cowles, another naval veteran of long experience and wide reputation, are a trio of the splendid armored cruisers of the Pacific fleet, with the little gunboat Annapolis. Off the southern coast of California, waiting the order to steam south to join Cowles, is the armored cruiser South Dakota, with the torpedo division of the Pacific fleet, the latter under command of Lieut. Martin K. Metcalf.

The following are the ships and their commanders guarding American interests on the Mexican Pacific Coast:

AT GUAYMAS.

Pittsburgh, armored cruiser of 13,680 tons displacement; Capt. William W. Gilmer, commanding; 41 officers and 837 men.

Annapolis, gunboat of 1,010 tons displacement; Commander Henry J. Ziegemeier, commanding; 8 officers and 148 men.

AT MAZATLAN.

California, flagship of Rear Admiral Walter C. Cowles, Commander-in-Chief of the Pacific fleet; armored cruiser 13,680 tons; Capt. Newton A. McCully, commanding, 48 officers and 837 men.

Maryland, armored cruiser of 13,680 tons; Commander Philip Andrews, commanding; 41 officers and 837 men.

Turning from the navy to the army, it is found that troops are massed at Galveston and Texas City, and that troops stretch along the Rio Grande from Laredo to El Paso, through the desert country, and along the boundary from El Paso west to San Diego.

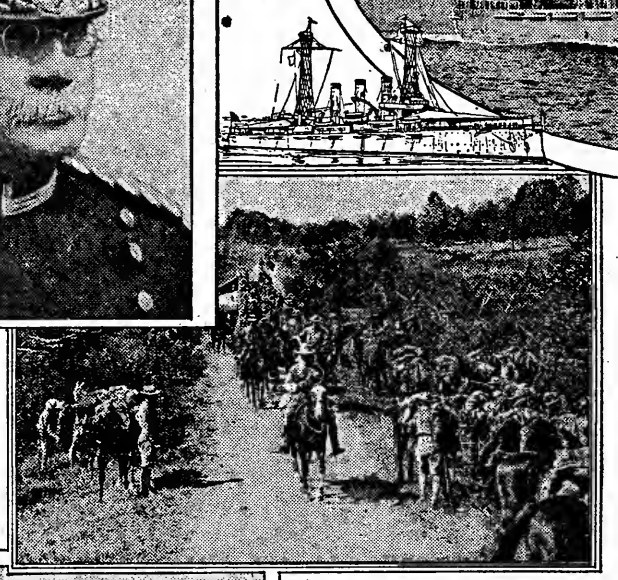
To the infantrymen, the field artillerymen, and the cavalrymen who today maintain the border patrol, and who are operating independently of the division under Major-Gen. William H. Carter at Galveston and Texas City, will fall the duty of instituting the blockade by land, a blockade that in many respects is already in force.

Exercising the chief command of the border patrol, with headquarters at San Antonio, is Brig.-Gen. Tasker H. Bliss, until a few months ago commanding the Department of the East, with headquarters at Fort Totten.

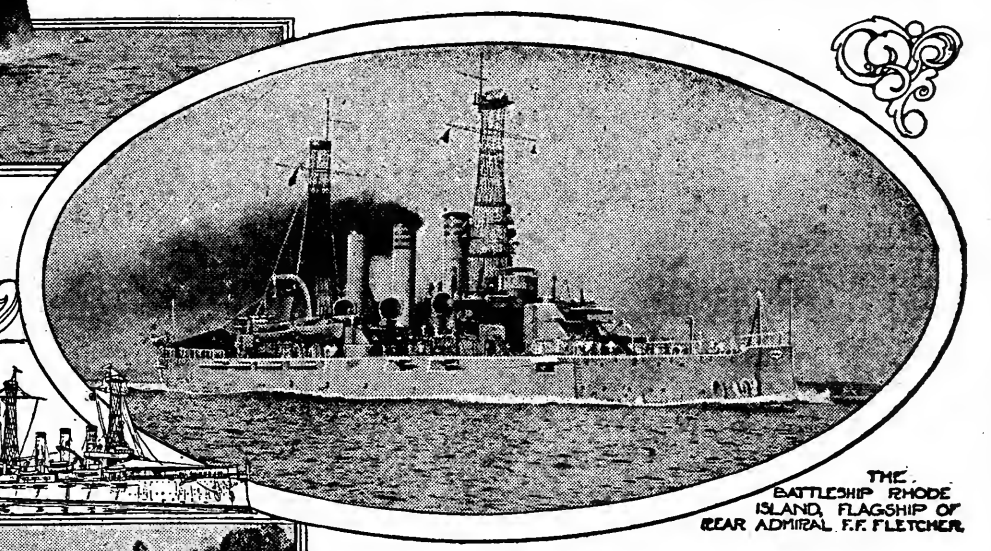
Under the immediate command of Brig.-Gen. Bliss are the First and Second Brigades of Cavalry, the two fine organizations that for the past three years have enforced American neutrality along the international border. The First Brigade is under command of Brig.-Gen. James Parker, operating with San Antonio as a base, while the Second Brigade attends to the arid desert wastes of Arizona and New Mexico, as well as a stretch of several hundreds of miles of the Texas frontier to the east of El Paso. Commanding this brigade, which for the last six months has borne the brunt of the border patrol, is the famous Brig.-Gen. Hugh L. Scott, the father of the Moros, the friend of the Indians, and the man who, in the opinion of many, will exercise one of the army's most important commands if Uncle Sam has to cross the Rio Grande.

Under Brig. Gen. Parker are the Third and Fourteenth Regiments of Cavalry, the first named now held in San Antonio waiting the chance again to lead the way into Mexico should the worst happen. It was the Third that led the Federal regulars into Mexico in 1847, and from Col. Blocksom, who succeeded to the command of the regiment when Hugh Scott was nominated for his Brigadier Generalship by President Wilson, down to the most youthful of the rookies, there is not a man in this gallant command but who hopes that the Third will again be the pilot if the American Army is called upon a second time to invade the land of the Montezumas.

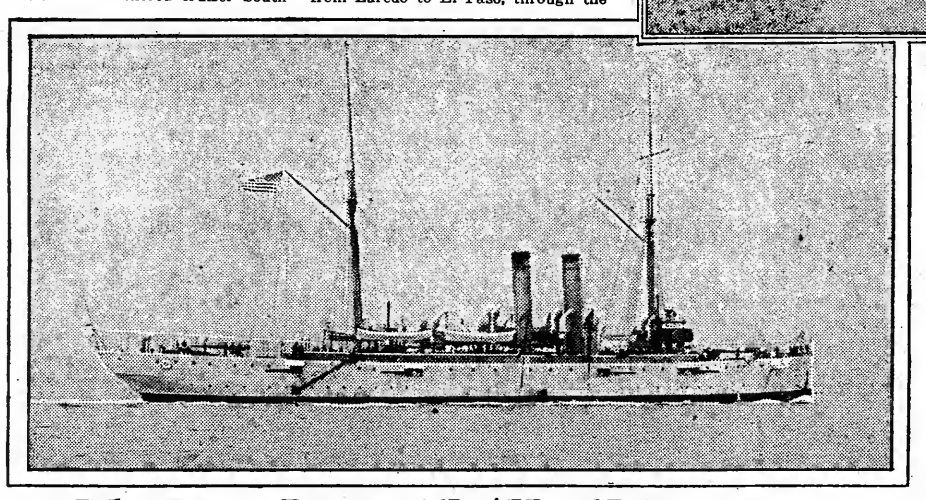
BRIG. GEN. H. L. SCOTT COMMANDING THE BORDER PATROL AT EL PASO, TEXAS



THE ADVANCE GUARD U.S CAVALRY.



THE BATTLESHIP RHODE ISLAND, FLAGSHIP OF REAR ADMIRAL F.F. FLETCHER.



THE CRUISER TACOMA OFF VERA CRUZ

New York Knows Sibley.

The Fourteenth Cavalry, the commander of which is Col. Frederick W. Sibley, well known to New Yorkers as the Commandant of Cadets at West Point during the latter part of the term of Gen. Scott as Superintendent, guards the extreme eastern end of the international boundary line. Troops A, B. C. D, E, F, G, and H, and the machine gun platoon, are operating east and west of Fort Clark, near Eagle Pass, Texas.

One hundred miles east of Eagle Pass, and massed at Laredo, opposite Nuevo Laredo, in the State of Nuevo Leon, Mexico, are troops I, K, L, and M, backed by Battery A of the famous Third Field Artillery under the command of the regimental commander, Col. Charles G. Treat, another officer who has seen much duty in this section of the country.

These two regiments of cavalry and the battery of artillery form the border command of Brig.-Gen. Parker. As the Colonel of the noted Eleventh Cavalry, there was no better known regimental commander in this country than Col. Parker. He is a native of New Jersey and the officer who at the Connecticut manoeuvers in 1912 was detailed to instruct the New York City cavalrymen in the fine points of cavalry warfare.

At Fort Bliss, the great border post on the hills back of El Paso, Brig.-Gen. Scott has his headquarters. From the eminence from which he directs the western border patrol the mountains of the great State of Chihuahua can be seen for more than a hundred miles, while in the valley of the Rio Grande the panorama of oft captured Juarez, the adobe city that has been described as "the alpha and omega of revolutions," is practically perfect.

Scott's Command Bigger.

Brig.-Gen. Scott's command is twice as large as that of Brig.-Gen. Parker. It comprises the Second, Fifth, Ninth, and Thirteenth regiments of cavalry and Battery C of the Sixth United States Field Horse Artillery, the guns of this command being at Fort Bliss.

To the Second Cavalry has been intrusted for the past year the patrol east of El Paso to a point near Del Rio, Texas. Every day these troopers cross every foot of the boundary line, riding in pairs, some to the east and others to the west, sometimes the stretch being 50 miles without a sign of human habitation. This, of course, does not refer to the five troops of the regiment now at Fort Bliss, which post is near enough to El Paso to make life agreeable.

But the troopers of the Second are veterans almost to the last man, and in his reports to the War Department Brig. Gen. Scott has declared that a better trained and more efficient body of men is not to be found in any army than these American regulars, who carry on their patrol in the face of sand storms that would do credit to the Sahara, and under a tropical sun beneath whose glare even snakes find it hard to live.

The troops at El Paso are B, F, I, K, L, and M, under command of Col. Frank West, the regimental commander. At Clint is Troop H. Troop A is at Fabens, Troopa C and E are at Shafter, Troop D is at old Fort Hancock on the Rio Grande, and Troop G is at Sierra Blanca, all these stations being on the Texas frontier.

In extreme Western Texas, and for the entire distance of the New Mexican frontier, ride the splendid horsemen of the Thirteenth United States Cavalry. The commander of this regiment is the veteran, Col. Charles A. P. Hatfield, an officer who in recent years has seen as much hard service as any man in the army. The troopers of the Thirteenth do not even have the Rio Grande to relieve the monotony of their service. Theirs is a patrol that runs for scores beyond scores of miles through a barren country, the boundary being marked by monuments at twenty-five-mile intervals.

At the point where Mexico, New Mexico, and Arizona touch the Fifth Cavalry takes up the burden of the patrol for the entire Arizona line, with the exception of that part whose center is Douglas. At Douglas the entire Ninth Cavalry, under Col. J. F. Guilfoyle, is mobilized and held in readiness for quick service in either direction.

Of much importance is the division of 12,000 troops of all mobile arms of the service massed at Galveston and Texas City. These troops can be rushed to the border or into Mexico by way of Vera Cruz or Tampico on the moment whenever President Wilson gives the word to go. For almost a year these troops have been waiting the order that will hurl them into action.

They have been drilled until they approach West Pointers in the perfection of their evolutions; they have been taught to care for themselves under all conditions; at the targets they have been trained until a large proportion of them approach the skill of the Texas rangers in shooting. The result is a division of infantrymen, cavalrymen, and field artillerymen superbly equipped and acclimated to tropical service.

In Galveston, under command of Brig. Gen. Thomas F. Davis, an old Indian fighter and one of the new Generals made by President Wilson, is the Fifth Brigade of Infantry. This is composed of the Fourth Infantry under Col. R. C. Van Vliet; the Seventh Infantry, under Col. Daniel Cornman; the Nineteenth Infantry, under Col. M. F. Waltz, who was Major Gen. Barry's Adjutant General in the second occupation of Cuba, and the Twenty-eighth under Col. E. H. Plummer.

Forces on Mainland.

Across the bay, and on the mainland opposite Galveston Island, are encamped the rest of the troops, commanded by Major-Gen. Carter. Brig.-Gen. John P. Wisser, another of President Wilson's recent appointments, and Brig.-Gen. Clarence Edwards are the officers commanding the infantry brigades there.

These brigades are composed of the Eleventh Regiment, under command of Col. Abner Pickering; the Eighteenth, Col. J. S. Rodgers, commanding; the Twenty-second, under Col. D. A. Frederick; the Twenty-third, whose commander is Col. Edwin F. Glenn of Philippine renown; the Twenty-sixth, under Col. R. L. Bullard, and the Twenty-seventh, whose commander is Col. R. N. Getty, one of the most widely known officers of that arm of the service. Also in Texas City are the Sixth Cavalry, Col. Charles M. O'Connor; the Fourth Field Artillery, Col. Lucien Berry; Company D of the Signal Corps, and Companies G, H, and M of the Engineer Corps.

In command of these troops is Major Gen. William H. Carter, who will probably retain the field command if the division is ordered into Mexico. Major Gen. Carter is a native of Tennessee and a West Pointer of the class of 1873. He is one of the old-time Indian fighters, a former assistant chief of the general staff, and a veteran of the Cuban and Philippine campaigns. He is 61.

If Major Gen. Carter is not continued in command, the man who will lead the army in the field will probably be Major Gen. Thomas H. Barry, the commanding General of the Eastern Division of the army on Governors Island. Only the other night at a dinner given at the Lotos Club in honor of Secretary of War Garrison, Major Gen. Barry referred to the possibility of the army's having again to face the problem of foreign service.

"In that event," he said, "many of us may not return, but whether we do or not, there is no doubt that the officers and the men of the regular service will live up to the finest traditions of the American Army."

"MAN NO GOOD UNTIL HE IS 75," SAYS OHIO MAYOR OF 87

Chief Magistrate of Bellecentre Threw His Hat in Municipal Ring Two Years Ago and Won.

I READ in the papers the other day something about man not amounting to much after he turned 40 years. That's all foolishness. Why, a man ain't worth a cent until he's 75 and over," asserts Mayor Joseph F. Dennis, aged 87 years, of Bellecentre, Ohio.

Dennis claims to be the oldest living Mayor in the United States. On Nov. 4 he was elected to a second term as Chief Executive of Bellecentre, a town boasting of nearly 2,000 inhabitants, having already been Mayor off and on since 1870. He is hale and hearty and, as he expresses it, "as spry as a cricket."

When Mayor Dennis reached the efficient age of 85 years he threw his hat into the ring of Bellecentre's municipal politics. This action caused loud laughter among those who then directed the fortunes of the Republican Party in the town.

"Why, old Dennis has one foot in the grave; he ought to be sitting by the fireside; his name is Dennis." All these and other merry quips were the order of the day when the patriarch got into the fight.

But Joseph F. Dennis took off his coat, figuratively speaking, and just sailed in. He kept right on sailing, too, and when the dust of that municipal campaign had settled the 85-year-old candidate was the Republican nominee.

Still the benighted of Bellecentre couldn't see it. They thought the nomination an accident. "It's a joke," they said.

Then they marshaled their forces to brush aside the aged interloper.

Followed the hottest campaign that Bellecentre had ever experienced. The aged candidate whipped his Democratic and Independent opponents, and was triumphantly elected by eight votes.

He was sworn into office with the old-fashioned Bible which has been in the Dennis family for 100 years. The ceremony was witnessed by half the village, including the retiring and incoming city officials and Councilmen. The inaugural took place in the Town Hall which Mr. Dennis built and dedicated when he was Mayor twenty-five years before.

At the age of 87 years Mayor Dennis proved he was even a better campaigner that when aged 85. He was, of course, given the Republican nomination for a second term, but the "young bloods" organized a Citizens' ticket, and Dennis was opposed for Mayor by Dr. W. S. Phillips.

Final count: Dennis, 103 votes; Phillips, 91.

On election day Mayor Dennis worked all day among his friends urging them to visit the polls. After the polls closed he remained up to hear all the returns.

"I am 87 years old, but I feel as spry as a youngster of 50," said Mayor Dennis yesterday. A man is just as old as he thinks—no older. All this stuff about being old at 40 and past one's usefulness at 60 is poppycock. A man has just as good a chance in politics or any other line of endeavor at 87 as he has at 27. I expect to serve out this second term and then I may run again.

"'Young men in politics' is right enough if the young men have any sense. It looks to me as if some of the young men are overreaching themselves in politics and that the 'old men' will have another whirl. The saying that you can't teach an old dog new tricks is the truth simply because there aren't any new tricks."

Mayor Dennis first served the town of Bellecentre as Marshal and Town Clerk. He was elected Mayor in 1870, and served until 1876. He was nominated and again elected Mayor in 1880, and served two terms. In 1886 he was again elected Mayor, and served until 1890, when he was defeated by two votes. He then waited patiently twenty-one years, until he thought the time was ripe for him to "come back."

"My name is Dennis, eh?" remarked the Mayor. "I am 87 years old. Tell the people that I expect to take an active part in the affairs of town and State for a good many more years.

"A man is only as old as he feels; I don't feel at all old. Do you play checkers?" asked Mayor Joseph Dennis.

I'm Going Home

I'M going home—I can't deny—
It's years since I saw mother cry,
And heard my father's steady moan
In deep rheumatic baritone.
How memory clings to vivify
The good advice, the humble pie,
The unpaid rent, the eagle eye;
Now that I've got a stiff backbone
I'm going home.
What made our hearthstone all awry?
My nerves were scraped—I had to fly.
How steady-handed I have grown
From all these peaceful years alone;
I don't—but maybe God knows why
I'm going home.

Morning Musing

SCRAPE! Scrape! Scrape!
Each morning I have to shave,
And then with a tonic to coax the hair
The top of my head I lave.
And this is the song I spin
While giving the blade a shove:
"Why can't I be bald upon my chin
And have whiskers that grow above?"

He Never Sang.

He never sang until the night,
Love, eager to depart,
Had wearied of his house, and winged
A shaft that pierced his heart!

THE HINDU POET WHO WON THE NOBEL LITERARY PRIZE

Entirely Unknown Outside His Own Country, He Is Yet the Accepted Poet of Fifty Million People, and the Bengalis Call This "the Epoch of Rabindranath."

THAT was a most astonishing literary announcement that recently came from Stockholm, in which the world was told that the Nobel prize for literature had been awarded to the Bengali poet, Rabindranath Tagore. Not only had the committee gone far afield seeking out, for the first time in the years that this great honor has been awarded, a man of the Orient, but more than this—the author it named is practically unknown here in the Occident.

Just how little known he is may be estimated from the fact that last Summer he visited this country and not a ripple of interest was stirred up. On this point it is illuminating to compare the reception given the potential winner of the Nobel prize for literature and that given Alfred Noyes, the English poet, who dropped in on us at about the same time and was given a reception such as has been tendered to few literary men.

The committee, however, has unearthed no neglected poetic genius: Tagore is, and has been for some years, the accepted poet of the people that use the Bengali tongue— a people that number over fifty millions.

William Butler Yeats quotes a "distinguished Bengali doctor of medicine" as saying: "We have other poets, but none that are his equal; we call this the epoch of Rabindranath. No poet seems to me as famous in Europe as he is among us. He is as great in music as in poetry, and his songs are sung from the west of India into Burmah wherever Bengali is spoken."

Translated from Bengali.

Here is the most remarkable fact in this winning by an Oriental of an Occidental literary prize: Tagore composed his poems along Eastern lines of thought, writing them in the Bengali language, addressing exclusively an Eastern audience. Subsequently he translated them into the English language.

It is possible that the committee in making its award to the Bengali poet based its action upon his achievements in his native tongue, but the probability is that Tagore's merit was appraised solely from his translations of his own works. "There are," says an English critic, "but few cases of a poet capable, in tongues so profoundly dissimilar as Bengali and English, of representing in the subtle nuances of one language the unfamiliar philosophic conceptions of another race in another continent, originally couched in another language."

As to the personal side of Tagore, there is very little information available in this country. In that vast storehouse of information, the New York Public Library, there are just two "Tagore" items indexed—a volume of poems and an article by Basanta Koomar Roy, published in "The Open Court," from which the following quotations, with their Oriental flavor, have been extracted:

If family tradition has anything to do with culture, then Rabindranath has nothing to complain of. He was born in the illustrious Thakur, anglicized into Tagore, family which has loomed high in the horizon of the intellectual and social life of India ever since the tenth century. Among the Tagores are counted men like Prosonno Koomar Tagore, a land owner, a lawyer of great reputation, an editor, a writer on legal and educational subjects, founder and President of the British India Association; Raja Sir Sourindra Mohun Tagore, undoubtedly one of the highest musical authorities in India, the founder of the Bengal Music School and the Bengal Academy of Music, and author of many volumes on Hindu music and musical instruments; Mr. Abanindranath Tagore, a distinguished painter, and an undisputed leader in the Hindu art revival; Maharaja Ramanath Tagore, brother of our poet's grandfather, a political leader and writer; Dwarakanath Tagore, the grandfather of the poet, a landlord, a founder of The Landholders' Society, a philanthropist and a social reformer.

* * *

Debendranath Tagore, the father of the poet, was not a Maharaja (great king.) He did not care to be decorated that way. Instead he was decorated by the people with the title of Maharsi (great sage.) He was one of India's greatest spiritual leaders and intellectual giants.

* * *

It was in such a family—a family that combined culture with wealth and leisure—that Rabindranath first saw the light of day. It is said that born poets are generally handsome. Rabindranath was no exception to the general rule. * * *

In one of his letters the poet tells us about some of his childhood experiences:

"I but faintly remember the days of my early childhood. But I do remember that in the mornings, every now and then, a kind of unspeakable joy, without any cause, used to overflow my heart. The whole world seemed to me full of mysteries. Every day I used to dig the earth with a little bamboo stick thinking that I might discover one of them. All the beauty, sweetness, and scent of this world, all the movements of the people, the noises in the street, the cry of the kites, the cocoanut trees in the family garden, the banyan tree by the pond, the shadow on the water, the morning perfume of the blossoms—all these used to make me feel the presence of a dimly recognized being assuming so many forms just to keep me company.

The future poet was then only 6 or 7 years old. He was so busy looking at and enjoying things natural that he hated to be hemmed in by the walls of the classroom. * * *

Maharsi Debendranath, after closely studying the inborn proclivities of his son, took him out of school, never to return for any length of time, and started with him for a trip to the heights of the Himalayas to train him in the school of nature. The first night out of Calcutta, as he was being carried in a palanquin to the Bolpur Shanti Niketan, (peace cottage at Bolpur, his father's country home for meditation,) he closed his eyes all the way to the bungalow simply not to see the beauties of nature by the faint light of the failing darkness, that he might take keener delight in the rich landscapes under the morning light.

When in the course of time the boy reached the Himalayas he knew that he had found what his heart was craving for—a wealth of the beauty of nature resplendent with the luxury of lovely color and majestic form.

His father taught him English, Sanskrit, and Bengali, and the sciences botany and astronomy.

Then a boy of only eleven Summers, having been born in the Spring of 1860, Rabindranath had already finished reading some of the most important books in Bengali literature. The next year his mother died, and his intense love for her now went to reinforce his worship of nature. At this time he was living at Chandranagore, in a garden house by the River Ganges. He would spend hours together watching the mystic flow of the Ganges or seeing the moon kiss the sacred river into ripples. Here he would spend night after night upon the flat roof of the house, musing on the mystery of the star-lit universe.

Thus he spent several years in dreaming, studying English and Bengali literature, (Bengali, a daughter of Sanskrit, and the language of Mr. Tagore's poems,) composing poems, and writing essays for different magazines, especially for his family magazine, the Bharati, which is now edited by his erudite sister, Sreemati Swarna Koomari Devi. At the age of 17 he made a short visit to Europe. His learned letters from there show his command over the Bengali language, his breadth of vision, and keen sociological insight. In England he perfected his knowledge of English and acquired a lucid prose style which few have equaled in India.

Mr. Tagore's versatility is astonishing. To name a few of his activities and accomplishments: He is a profound philosopher, a spiritual and patriotic leader, a historical investigator, a singer and composer, an able editor, (having edited four different magazines, Sadhana, Bangadarsan, Bharati, and Tattwabodhini,) a farsighted educator, and a kind and considerate administrator of his vast "Zamindary" estate. But he is, above all, the poet—the poet of love. He interprets love in all its multiform expressions. * * *

Expression of love is so natural to him because of the fact that he has, like many other poets, passed through all the phases of love and life. Like the prose-poet Tolstoy, he has traveled from the worship of the senses to the quiet of sainthood. * * *

When the surging tide of youth overtook the young poet quite unawares, he, in the onrush, could see only love and romance. * * * Thus for a time he became an epicure and bonvivant; fashionable dress—the finest of silk robes—delicious dishes, ardent romances, love lyrics, literary production, constituted his interests, though there was always present in his subconscious self a strong undercurrent of spirituality which he inherited from his father.

It cannot be denied that in spite of this undercurrent many of his youthful poems were colored by the still stronger surface current of his life. Indeed, some of them shocked the old-fashioned Hindu moralists, who received them with disdain. I remember one day in a students' boarding house in India, when I was trying to sing one of Mr. Tagore's songs, some of the young men that were present shouted: "What makes you sing that nautch song?"

* * *

Dividing his time between his palatial home in Calcutta and Bolpur Peace Cottage, he was on the one hand receiving the message of life, action, noise, politics, and society in Calcutta, while on the other he was profiting by the inspiration of nature and quiet at Bolpur, but devoting most of his time to writing plays, essays, songs, and poems. As the two outward forces were acting and reacting on each other, similarly the opposite currents of the sensuous and the spiritual within him were struggling to harmonize themselves. During this period of doubt, despair, and uncertainty the poet wrote poems on such subjects as "The Call of Sorrow," "Lamentation of Happiness," and "Despair of Hope."

At last the undercurrent of spirituality came to the surface again and in the process drove the opposite current out of existence. His entire life was now saturated with the spirit of this renascence. He got what he sought; and the story of such a transformation he gives in a letter which, in translation, reads:

"One morning, the moment I saw from my veranda the sun rising from behind the foliage of the trees in the garden, the scales fell from my eyes. A singular glory covered the entire universe for me—bliss and beauty seemed to ripple all over the world. Then nobody and nothing whatsoever remained unwelcome to me. The people whose company was heretofore unpleasant to me, now on their approach my heart would run before me to offer them a cordial welcome. Even the coarse forms and features of some of the members of the laboring class, as they passed by on the street, had an inner glory for me."

With the change in the man changed the tone of his poems. Now, filled to the brim with the love for God and looking upon this universe as the visible expression of God's love, he touches nothing, he writes nothing, that he does not saturate with the thought of divine love, of spiritual life, and of eternal beauty and splendor in nature. The sun, the moon, the stars in heaven, and the trees and flowers on earth speak a language of love for the Supreme Being, whose handiwork they are. Mr. Yeats speaks of the spirituality of Mr. Tagore's later poems in these words: "In all his poems there is one single theme: the love of God. When I tried to find anything Western which might compare with the works of Mr. Tagore, I throught of the 'Imitation of Christ,' by Thomas à Kempis. It is like, yet between the work of the two men there is a whole world of difference. Thomas à Kempis was obsessed by the thought of sin; he wrote in terrible imagery. Mr. Tagore has as little thought of sin as a child playing with a top. His poems have stirred my blood as nothing has for years."

American Publication.

Two volumes of his poems have been published in this country by the Macmillan Company: "The Gardener" and "Gitanjali." As a preface to the former, Tagore says:

Most of the lyrics of love and life, the translations of which from Bengali are published in this book, were written much earlier than the series of religious poems contained in the book named "Gitanjali." The translations are not always literal—the originals being sometimes abridged and sometimes paraphrased.

Here are some of the poems of Tagore. The first eleven, without title, were selected from the eighty-five that make up "The Gardener."

I am restless. I am athirst for faraway things.

My soul goes out in a longing to touch the skirt of the dim distance.

O Great Beyond, O the keen call of thy flute!

I forget, I ever forget, that I have no wings to fly, that I am bound in this spot evermore.

I am eager and wakeful, I am a stranger in a strange land.

Thy breath comes to me whispering an impossible hope.

Thy tongue is known to my heart as its very own.

O Far-to-seek, O the keen call of thy flute!

I forget, I ever forget, that I know not the way, that I have not the winged horse.

I am listless, I am a wanderer in my heart.

In the sunny haze of the languid hours, what vast vision of thine takes shape in the blue of the sky!

O Farthest end, O the keen call of thy flute!

I forget, I ever forget, that the gates are shut everywhere in the house where I dwell alone!

* * *

When the lamp went out by my bed I woke up with the early birds.

I sat at my open window with a fresh wreath on my loose hair.

The young traveler came along the road in the rosy mist of the morning.

A pearl chain was on his neck, and the sun's rays fell on his crown. He stopped before my door and asked me with an eager cry, "Where is she?"

For very shame I could not say, "She is I, younger traveler, she is I."

It was dusk and the lamp was not lit.

I was listlessly braiding my hair.

The young traveler came on his chariot in the glow of the setting sun.

His horses were foaming at the mouth, and there was dust on his garment.

He alighted at my door and asked in a tired voice, "Where is she?"

For very shame I could not say, "She is I, weary traveler, she is I."

It is an April night. The lamp is burning in my room.

The breeze of the south comes gently. The noisy parrot sleeps in its cage.

My bodice is of the color of the peacock's throat, and my mantle is green as young grass.

I sit upon the floor at the window watching the deserted street.

Through the dark night I keep humming, "She is I, despairing traveler, she is I."

* * *

Hands cling to hands and eyes linger on eyes: thus begins the record of our hearts.

It is the moonlit night of March; the sweet smell of henna is in the air; my flute lies on the earth neglected and your garland of flowers is unfinished.

This love between you and me is simple as a song.

Your veil of the saffron color makes my eyes drunk.

The jasmine wreath that you wove me thrills to my heart like praise.

It is a game of giving and withholding, revealing and screening again; some smiles and some little shyness, and some sweet useless struggles.

This love between you and me is simple as a song.

No mystery beyond the present; no striving for the impossible; no shadow behind the charm; no groping in the depth of the dark.

This love between you and me is simple as a song.

We do not stray out of all words into the ever silent; we do not raise our hands to the void for things beyond hope.

It is enough what we give and we get.

We have not crushed the joy to the utmost to wring from it the wine of pain.

This love between you and me is simple as a song.

* * *

You are the evening cloud floating in the sky of my dreams.

I paint you and fashion you ever with my love longings.

You are my own, my own, Dweller in my endless dreams!

Your feet are rosy-red with the glow of my heart's desire, Gleaner of my sunset songs!

Your lips are bitter-sweet with the taste of my wine of pain.

You are my own, my own, Dweller in my lonesome dreams!

With the shadow of my passion have I darkened your eyes, Haunter of the depth of my gaze!

My heart, the bird of the wilderness, has found its sky in your eyes.

They are the cradle of the morning, they are the kingdom of the stars.

My songs are lost in their depths.

Let me but soar in that sky, in its lonely immensity.

Let me but cleave its clouds and spread wings in its sunshine.

* * *

When she passed by me with quick steps, the end of her skirt touched me.

From the unknown island of a heart came a sudden warm breath of Spring.

A flutter of a flitting touch brushed me and vanished in a moment, like a torn flower petal blown in the breeze.

It fell upon my heart like a sigh of her body and whisper of her heart.

* * *

"Come to us, youth, tell us truly why there is madness in your eyes?"

"I know not what wine of wild poppy I have drunk, that there is this madness in my eyes."

"Ah, shame!"

"Well, some are wise and some foolish, some are watchful and some careless. There are eyes that smile and eyes that weep—and madness is in my eyes."

"Youth, why do you stand so still under the shadow of the tree?"

"My feet are languid with the burden of my heart, and I stand still in the shadow."

"Ah, shame!"

"Well, some march on their way and some linger, some are free and some are fettered—and my feet are languid with the burden of my heart."

* * *

You left me and went on your way.

I thought I should mourn for you and set your solitary image in my heart wrought in a golden song.

But ah, my evil fortune, time is short.

Youth wanes year after year; the Spring days are fugitive; the frail flowers die for nothing, and the wise man warns me that life is but a dewdrop on the lotus leaf.

Should I neglect all this to gaze after one who has turned her back on me?

That would be rude and foolish, for time is short.

Then, come, my rainy nights with pattering feet; smile, my golden Autumn; come, careless April, scattering your kisses abroad.

You come, and you, and you also!

My loves, you know we are mortals. Is it wise to break one's heart for the one who takes her heart away? For time is short.

It is sweet to sit in a corner to muse and write in rhymes that you are all my world.

It is heroic to hug one's sorrow and determine not to be consoled.

But a fresh face peeps across my door and raises its eyes to my eyes.

I cannot but wipe away my tears and change the tune of my song.

For time is short.

* * *

I hold her hands and press her to my breast.

I try to fill my arms with her loveliness, to plunder her sweet smile with kisses, to drink her dark glances with my eyes.

Ah, but, where is it? Who can strain the blue from the sky?

I try to grasp the beauty, it eludes me, leaving only the body in my hands.

Baffled and weary I come back.

How can the body touch the flower which only the spirit may touch?

* * *

I plucked your flower, O world!

I pressed it to my heart and the thorn pricked.

When the day waned and it darkened, I found that the flower had faded, but the pain remained.

More flowers will come to you with perfume and pride, O world!

But my time for flower-gathering is over, and through the dark night I have not my rose, only the pain remains.

* * *

One morning in the flower garden a blind girl came to offer me a flower chain in the cover of a lotus leaf.

I put it round my neck, and tears came to my eyes.

I kissed her and said, "You are blind even as the flowers are.

"You yourself know not how beautiful is your gift."

* * *

Why do you whisper so faintly in my ears, O Death, my Death?

When the flowers droop in the evening and cattle come back to their stalls, you stealthily come to my side and speak words that I do not understand?

Is this how you must woo and win me with the opiate of drowsy murmur and cold kisses, O Death, my Death?

Will there be no proud ceremony for our wedding?

Will you not tie up with a wreath your tawny coiled locks?

Is there none to carry your banner before you, and will not the night be on fire with your red torchlights, O Death, my Death?

Come with your conch-shells sounding, come in the sleepless night.

Dress me with a crimson mantle, grasp my hand and take me.

Let your chariot be ready at my door with your horses neighing impatiently.

Raise my veil and look at my face proudly, O Death, my Death!

* * *

THE INFINITE LOVE.

I have ever loved thee in a hundred forms and times,
Age after age, in birth following birth,
The chain of songs that my fond heart did weave
Thou graciously didst take round thy neck,
Age after age, in birth following birth.

When I listen to the tales of the primitive past,
The love-pangs of the far distant times,
The meetings and partings of the ancient ages—
I see thy form gathering light
Through the dark dimness of Eternity
And appearing as a star ever fixed in the memory of the ALL.

We two have come floating by the twin currents of love
That well up from the inmost heart of the Beginningless.
We two have played in the lives of myriad lovers
In tearful solitude of sorrow,
In tremulous shyness of sweet union,
In old, old love ever renewing its life.

THE TEMPLE.

With days of hard travail I raised a temple.
It had no doors or windows, its walls were thickly built with massive stones.
I forgot all else, I shunned all the world,
I gazed in rapt contemplation at the image I set upon the altar.
The night there was everlasting, lit by the lamps of perfumed oil.
The ceaseless smoke of incense wound my heart in its heavy coils.
Sleepless, I carved on the walls fantastic figures in mazy lines, bewildering—winged horses, flowers with human face, women with the curving limbs of a serpent.
No passage was left anywhere through which could enter the song of birds, the murmur of leaves, or the hum of the busy village.
The only sound that echoed in its dark dome was my own chanting of incantations.
My mind became keen and still like a pointed flame, my senses swooned in ecstasy.
I knew not how time passed till a thunderstone had struck the temple, and a pain stung me through my heart as it were a snake of fire.
Suddenly a gap yawned in the stony walls, the daylight streamed in, and voices came from the world.
The lamp became pale and ashamed.
The carvings on the walls, like chained dreams, looked meaningless in the light, and vainly tried to find a hiding place.
The closed walls opened in my temple.
I looked at the image on the altar.
I saw it smiling and alive with the living touch of God.
The captive night spread its wings and vanished.

MYSTERY OF NEW YORK'S MISSING

MORE than 4,500 persons are reported to the New York police every year as missing. Of these, about 3,500 are residents of the city, while the remainder are visitors.

The New Yorkers who vanish from their homes are reported to the police stations in the local precincts, and those cases are handled by the precinct authorities. But the reports of missing visitors, regardless of where made originally, ultimately go to the Bureau of Missing Persons at Police Headquarters.

This bureau is managed in conjunction with the Bureau of Unidentified Dead, established on the suggestion of Second Deputy Police Commissioner Dougherty after the failure of the officials promptly to identify "Big Tim" Sullivan's body. Sergt. Grant Williams is in immediate charge of both bureaus.

Information from official sources shows that minors constitute approximately two-thirds of the New York residents stated to be missing annually. The remaining one-third is composed chiefly of men.

It is estimated that more than one-half of the 3,500 are located by the police, dead or alive, or return to their homes soon after disappearance, notification of the return being sent to the officials. Of the remainder it is estimated that at least one-half ultimately arrive back home in safety, but no notification of the fact is sent to the police.

This leaves about 850 persons per year who utterly vanish. What becomes of them is one of the mysteries of the metropolis. They disappear as though they were so many bubbles. Some of them doubtless kill themselves or are killed, their bodies never being discovered. Some of them, it may be set down as certain, run away from their matrimonial mates. But what the fate is of the great mass of them no man can say.

Of the large number of minors who figure each year as missing, police officials state that the big majority are youths and girls between the ages of 15 and 20. They are often wage-earners, disgruntled with conditions at home, either because they have to give what they consider too large a proportion of their wages to the family exchequer, or because they think their parents too strict with them in the matter of pleasure seeking.

Of the 1,000 residents of other places for whom the police are annually asked to look, a considerable percentage are men who have come to New York to find relaxation from the workaday grind in the gayeties of Broadway. They get into the whirl of things rather more than they intended, and are lost to their friends' view for a few days. Ultimately most of these wanderers in the fields of frivolity turn up all right, with a bit of headache, perhaps, and a determination not to seek relaxation quite so persistently on the next New York visit.

Other strangers to the city get separated from their friends in the Subway or on the elevated or get lost in the streets, and then the police are asked to find the missing ones. Immigrants in transit from European countries to inland points in the United States frequently wander off from the parties to which they are attached and have to be found through the medium of the police.

In the course of a year Sergt. Williams receives scores of letters from foreign countries inquiring about friends or relatives of the writers who were last heard from in New York. From Zanzibar and from India, from Australia and from Egypt, from Europe, from South America, the letters of inquiry travel.

The proportion of these non-residents of New York never to be heard of again as estimated by the police is about the same as in the case of New York citizens. That is, something more than one-half of the 1,000 are located by the police or return to their friends, the police being so notified. About one-half of the remainder finally reach their friends all right, it is estimated, the police not being notified. This leaves approximately 250 visitors to New York who vanish yearly without anything whatever being known of their fate. With the 850 New Yorkers who absolutely disappear, there is thus a total in round figures of 1,100 persons who every twelve months are lost to sight as utterly as though they had stepped behind a magic curtain.

The Bureau of Unidentified Dead has been in operation since Oct. 1 of this year. Police officials declare that in this short time it has amply proved its value. Out of fifty-eight cases of unidentified dead reported to the bureau in October, the identity in all but seven was established by the bureau's work, while out of twenty-four cases reported up to the middle of November, identity was established in all instances but three.

A feature of the bureau's system which is proving of great aid is the work done through laundry marks. At the suggestion of Second Deputy Commissioner Dougherty, the bureau has made a collection of the marks put on clothing by all laundries in New York. When a body is found which has no means of identification except through laundry marks, the marks are compared with those on file in the bureau. If the victim's clothes prove to have been laundered in New York, the laundry is visited, and from examination of its books it is usually possible to trace the identity of the dead person.

Names of tailors and of clothing manufacturers also lead to many identifications. Tattoo marks have in several instances meant identification.

Men are largely in the majority among the cases coming before the bureau. A majority of the unidentified dead are found in the water. Most of them are doubtless suicides. Others of the unidentified cases are due to street car accidents, suicide by gas, and sudden death in the street from natural causes. Photographs are taken of all bodies, and prove of much aid in making identification. In occasional instances identification from photographs has resulted, even after burial in Potter's Field.

Silver Waters

By MARGARET O. B. WILKINSON.

RUN, run, silver waters,
Underneath the sycamores!
Ah, what rush of fluent music
Through the ample shadow pours!

Leap, dance, silver waters,
Over boulders brown and cool;
Slip around each pebbly corner
Quickly, to the swimming pool!

Run, run, silver waters,
Till the open pool is won,
Where our little laughing brothers
Plunge and paddle in the sun!

SCOTT'S OWN STORY OF HIS TERRIBLE MARCH TO DEATH

Graphically the Explorer's Journal Shows Day by Day How Hope Changed to Doubt and Doubt to the Certainty of Doom—In Its Pages One May Read a Tale of Heroism Seldom Paralleled.

WHEN Capt. Robert F. Scott, awaiting death on his return from the south pole, penned with his fast-stiffening fingers his "Message to the Public," he wrote:

"Had we lived, I should have had a tale to tell of the hardihood, endurance, and courage of my companions which would have stirred the heart of every Englishman."

But, though he did not live, he did tell the tale, and it is one which will stir the heart of every man the world over who is capable of pity and admiration. As he and his heroic companions made their dauntless fight, he wrote their experiences day by day, and the simple but terrible story has now been published by Dodd, Mead & Co., under the title of "Scott's Last Expedition."

The story, of course, covers the whole expedition, but that part which will thrill every heart that can be thrilled by tales of heroism and suffering is the account of the return from the pole. Undertaken with high hopes, one can trace in the daily record the gradual entrance of terrible doubts which soon culminated in a dreadful certainty, and can see how, even after this certainty became fixed, the five heroes fought on because it was their nature to fight.

All their preparations for suicide had been made, but they finally left the poison untouched and went their way as long as they could move, and when they could no longer move, lay down to await the end. Nothing finer in English history has ever been recorded than the action of Capt. Oates, when, knowing that he was a burden to his companions, he said: "I am just going outside and may be some time," and walked boldly out into the blizzard to die.

Markham's Tribute.

These five brave men were Capt. Robert Falcon Scott, R. N.; Lieut. Henry R. Bowers, R. N.; Capt. Lawrence E. G. Oates of the Sixth Inniskilling Dragoons (nicknamed "Titus Oates" by his comrades); Dr. Edward Adrian Wilson, chief of the scientific staff and zoologist of the expedition, and Petty Officer Edgar Evans, R. N. Evans was supposed to be the strongest man of the expedition, but was the first to give out.

In a preface to the book Sir Clements Markham says of Scott:

The chief traits which shone forth through his life were conspicuous in the hour of death. There are few events in history to be compared, for grandeur and pathos, with the last closing scene in that silent wilderness of snow.

The great leader, with the bodies of his dearest friends beside him, wrote and wrote until the pencil dropped from his dying grasp. There was no thought of himself, only the earnest desire to give comfort and consolation to others in their sorrow. His very last lines were written lest he who induced him to enter upon Antarctic work should now feel regret for what he had done:

"If I cannot write to Sir Clements, tell him I thought much of him, and never regretted his putting me in command of the Discovery."

The return journey began on Jan. 19, 1912, and on the first day Scott recorded that it was "warmer and pleasanter marching with the wind." He was afraid, however, that the return journey was "going to be dreadfully tiring and monotonous." But two days later he admitted, "We are going to have a pretty hard time this next 100 miles, I expect. If it was difficult to drag downhill over this belt, it will probably be a good deal more difficult to drag up."

The first sign of anything being wrong with the party came on Jan. 23, when Scott wrote:

There is no doubt Evans is a good deal run down—his fingers are badly blistered and his nose is rather seriously congested with frequent frost bites. He is very much annoyed with himself, which is not a good sign. I think Wilson, Bowers, and I are as fit as possible under the circumstances. Oates gets cold feet. One way and another, I shall be glad to get off the summit.

The following day Scott began to be worried by the high winds which were to prove their ruin:

Things beginning to look a little serious. A strong wind at the start has developed into a full blizzard at luncheon, and we have had to get into our sleeping-bags. * * * This is the second full gale since we left the pole. I don't like the look of it. Is the weather breaking up? If so, God help us, with the tremendous summit journey and scant food. Wilson and Bowers are my stand-by. I don't like the easy way in which Oates and Evans get frostbitten.

But things moved along rather well from that date until Jan. 30, when Scott wrote:

Wilson has strained a tendon in his leg; it has given pain all day and is swollen to-night. Of course, he is full of pluck over it, but I don't like the idea of such an accident here. To add to the trouble Evans has dislodged two fingernails to-night; his hands are really bad, and to my surprise he shows signs of losing heart over it. * * * We can get along with bad fingers, but it will be a mighty serious thing if Wilson's leg doesn't improve.

Evans's end was near. On Feb. 4 he and Scott both fell into crevasses. This was Evans's second fall. Not much was thought of the incident at the time, though Scott recorded, "The party is not improving in condition, especially Evans, who is becoming rather dull and incapable." The fact was that in the fall Evans had suffered a concussion of the brain. On Feb. 6 Scott wrote:

Food is low and weather uncertain, so that many hours of the day were anxious; but this evening, though we are not as far advanced as I expected, the outlook is much more promising. Evans is the chief anxiety now; his cuts and wounds suppurate, his nose looks very bad, and altogether he shows considerable signs of being played out. Things may mend for him on the glacier, and his wounds get some respite under warmer conditions.

Evans Grew Worse.

They finished the summit journey on Feb. 7, and Scott expressed his satisfaction, saying that "another week might have had a very bad effect on Evans, who is steadily going down hill." On Feb. 14 he wrote:

There is no getting away from the fact that we are not going strong. Probably none of us. Wilson's leg still troubles him and he doesn't like to trust himself on ski; but the worst case is Evans, who is giving us serious anxiety. This morning he suddenly disclosed a huge blister on his foot. It delayed us on the march, when he had to have his crampon readjusted. Sometimes I fear he is going from bad to worse, but I trust he will pick up again when we come to steady work on ski like this afternoon * * *

Feb. 16. A rather trying position. Evans has nearly broken down in brain, we think. He is absolutely changed from his normal, self-reliant self. This morning and this afternoon he stopped the march on some trivial excuse.

This last entry was made the day before Evans's death. On Feb. 17 Scott records that event as follows:

A very terrible day. Evans looked a little better after a good sleep, and declared, as he always did, that he was quite well. He started in his place on the traces, but half an hour later worked his ski shoes adrift, and had to leave the sledge. The surface was awful, the soft recently fallen snow clogging the ski and runners at every step, the sledge groaning, the sky overcast, and the land hazy.

We stopped after about one hour, and Evans came up again, but very slowly. Half an hour later he dropped out again on the same plea. He asked Howers to lend him a piece of string. I cautioned him to come on as quickly as he could, and he answered cheerfully, as I thought.

We had to push on, and the remainder of us were forced to pull very hard, sweating heavily. Abreast the Monument Rock we stopped, and, seeing Evans a long way astern, I camped for lunch. There was no alarm at first, and we prepared tea and our own meal, consuming the latter.

After lunch, and Evans still not appearing, we looked out, to see him still afar off. By this time we were alarmed, and all four started back on ski. I was first to reach the poor man and shocked at his appearance; he was on his knees, with clothing disarranged, hands uncovered and frost-bitten, and a wild look in his eyes. Asked what was the matter, he replied with a slow speech that he didn't know, but thought he must have fainted.

We got him on his feet, but after two or three steps he sank down again. He showed every sign of complete collapse. Wilson, Bowers, and I went back for the sledge, while Oates remained with him. When we returned he was practically unconscious, and, when we got him into the tent, quite comatose. He died quietly at 12:30 A. M.

On discussing the symptoms we think he began to get weaker just before we reached the pole, and that his downward path was accelerated first by the shock of his frostbitten fingers, and later by falls during rough traveling on the glacier, further by his loss of all confidence in himself. Wilson thinks it certain he must have injured his brain by a fall. It is a terrible thing to lose a companion in this way, but calm reflection shows that there could not have been a better ending to the terrible anxieties of the past week. Discussion of the situation at luncheon yesterday shows us what a desperate pass we were in with a sick man on our hands at such a distance from home.

Scott now begins to record days of traveling over terrible surfaces and of his vain hopes that he will soon escape from them. "It has been like pulling over desert sand, not the least glide in the world," he says, on Feb. 19, and on Feb. 21, "Heavy toiling all day, inspiring gloomiest thoughts at times." The doomed explorers were already beginning to foresee what their end might be. On March 2 comes this record:

Misfortunes rarely come singly. We marched to the (Middle Barrier) depot fairly easily yesterday afternoon, and since that have suffered three distinct blows that have placed us in a bad position. First we found a shortage of oil; with most rigid economy it can scarce carry us to the next depot on this surface, (71 miles away.) Second, Titus Oates disclosed his feet, the toes showing very bad indeed, evidently bitten by the late temperatures. The third blow came in the night, when the wind, which we had hailed with some joy, brought dark overcast weather.

The surface continued as bad as ever, and on March 3 Scott cried, "God help us, we can't keep up this pulling, that is certain. Among ourselves we are unendingly cheerful, but what each man feels in his heart I can only guess." And on March 4:

Things looking very black indeed. All the morning we had to pull with all our strength, and in 4½ hours we covered 3½ miles. One has little to hope for except strong dry wind—an unlikely contingency at this time of year.

We are in a very tight place indeed, but none of us despondent yet, or at least we preserve every semblance of good cheer, but one's heart sinks as the sledge stops dead at some sastrugi behind which the surface sand lies thickly heaped.

A shortage of oil added to the terror of the situation, and they had only a week's food. The next day Scott said that it was "telling on all, but mainly on Oates, whose feet are in a wretched condition. One swelled up tremendously last night, and he is very lame this morning." It was evident already that Oates was soon to follow Evans, and Scott said of him:

Our fuel dreadfully low and the poor soldier nearly done. It is pathetic enough because we can do nothing for him; more hot food might do a little, but only a little, I fear. We none of us expected these terribly low temperatures, and of the rest of us Wilson is feeling them most; mainly, I fear, from his self-sacrificing devotion in doctoring Oates's feet. We cannot help each other, each has enough to do to take care of himself.

March 6.—Poor Oates is unable to pull, sits on the sledge when we are track-searching—he is wonderfully plucky, as his feet must be giving him great pain. He makes no complaint, but his spirits only come up in spurts now, and he grows more silent in the tent. * * * If we were all fit I should have hopes of getting through, but the poor soldier has become a terrible hindrance, though he does his utmost and suffers much, I fear.

Death Before Them.

"Wonderfully brave" is the way Scott describes the Captain, and he says, on March 7: "One feels that for poor Oates the crisis is near, but none of us is improving, though we are wonderfully fit, considering the really excessive work we are doing." On March 8 Dr. Wilson's feet begin to give trouble, "but this mainly because he gives so much help to others."

On March 10 Scott faces the steadily approaching certainty of death for all of them:

Oates's foot worse. He has rare pluck and must know that he can never get through. He asked Wilson if he had a chance this morning, and of course Bill had to say he didn't know. In point of fact, he has none.

Apart from him, if he went under now, I doubt whether we could get through. With great care we might have a dog's chance, but no more. The weather conditions are awful, and our gear gets steadily more icy and difficult to manage. At the same time, of course, poor Titus is the greatest handicap. * * * Poor chap! It is too pathetic to watch him; one cannot but try to cheer him up.

On March 11 they made their preparations for suicide:

Titus Oates is very near the end, one feels. What we or he will do, God only knows. We discussed the matter after breakfast; he is a brave, fine fellow, and understands the situation, but he practically asked for advice. Nothing could be said but to urge him to march as long as he could.

One satisfactory result to the discussion: I practically ordered Wilson to hand over the means of ending our troubles to us, so that any one of us may know how to do so. Wilson had no choice between doing so and our ransacking the medicine case. We have thirty opium tabloids apiece, and he is left with a tube of morphine. So far the tragical side of our story.

Three days later Oates "got it again in the foot," and the next day he made his exit from the world like an English soldier. Here is the story as Scott tells it:

Tragedy all along the line. At lunch the day before yesterday (probably March 15) poor Titus Oates said he couldn't go on; he proposed we should leave him in his sleeping-bag. That we could not do, and induced him to come on, on the afternoon march. In spite of its awful nature for him he struggled on and we made a few miles. At night he was worse and we knew the end had come.

Should this be found I want these facts recorded. Oates's last thoughts were of his mother, but immediately before he took pride in thinking that his regiment would be pleased with the bold way in which he met his death.

We can testify to his bravery. He has borne intense suffering for weeks without complaint, and to the very last was able and willing to discuss outside subjects. He did not—would not—give up hope to the very end. He was a brave soul. This was the end.

He slept through the night before, last, hoping not to wake; but he woke in the morning—yesterday. It was blowing a blizzard. He said, "I am just going outside and may be some time." He went out into the blizzard and we have not seen him since.

We knew that poor Oates was walking to his death, but though we tried to dissuade him, we knew it was the act of a brave man and an English gentleman. We all hope to meet the end with a similar spirit, and assuredly the end is not far.

Blizzard Meant the End.

Even on this day Scott writes that his "companions are unendingly cheerful." On March 18 Scott's right foot went. On March 19 they were three days' march from the depot, with two days' food and one day's fuel. Blizzards were constant. Finally, on the 20th, came the blizzard, which, lasting for days, extinguished their last faint hope. They talked it over and decided that they would not commit suicide, but would let death come as it would. Here are Scott's last entries:

March 22 and 23.—Blizzard bad as ever——Wilson and Bowers unable to start——to-morrow last chance——no fuel and only one or two of food left ——must be near the end. Have decided it shall be natural——we shall march for the depot, with or without our effects, and die in our tracks.

March 29.—Since the 21st we have had a continuous gale from W. S. W. and S. W. We had fuel to make two cups of tea apiece and bare food for two days on the 20th. Every day we have been ready to start for our depot, eleven miles away, but outside the door of the tent it remains a scene of whirling drift. I do not think we can hope for any better things now. We shall stick it out to the end, but we are getting weaker, of course, and the end cannot be far.

It seems a pity, but I do not think I can write more. R. SCOTT.

For God's sake look after our people.

These were the last words in Scott's journal. But he left some affecting letters, one of which was to Wilson's widow, and read as follows:

My dear Mrs. Wilson:

If this letter reaches you Bill and I will have gone out together. We are very near it now and I should like you to know how splendid he was at the end—everlastingly cheerful and ready to sacrifice himself for others, never a word of blame to me for leading him into this mess. He is not suffering, luckily, at least only minor discomforts.

His eyes have a comfortable blue look of hope, and his mind is peaceful with the satisfaction of his faith in regarding himself as part of the great scheme of the Almighty. I can do no more to comfort you than to tell you that he died as he lived, a brave, true man—the best of comrades and stanchest of friends.

My whole heart goes out to you in pity. Yours, R. SCOTT.

Scott survived his two companions. Wilson and Bowers were found in the attitude of sleep, their sleeping-bags closed over their heads as they would naturally close them. Scott, the last to go, had thrown back the flaps of his sleeping-bag and opened his coat. The little wallet containing his three notebooks was under his shoulders and his arm flung across Wilson's body. So they were found eight months later.

PEARY—"THE DEGREE OF THE FROZEN SEA"

THE mad winds rage 'round his icy cage
And the blinding snows sweep by.
Back from the pole the white dunes roll
To the rim of the listless sky.
The ghastly plain burns in his brain
A delirium, strange and wild.
He hears the tread of nations dead
Where the treacherous drifts are piled.

She lured them along with her magic song
Through the dim, enchanted light.
Now the bitter winds chant requiems
O'er their sepulchres of white.
She has fashioned a bed for her martyred dead
In the lap of the drifted snows,
Her croon-song wild soothes each trail-spent child,
'Mid the rear of the grinding floes.

With song and shout, the hosts rush out
O'er the fields of deadly snow;
The hidden pole is their fatal goal,
As it was in the long ago.

No pause or slack, as the yelping pack
Swings over the wastes afar,
And those who fail mark the gruesome trail
That sweeps to the polar star.

He hears the song of the martyred throng
No pause or slack, as the yelping pack
Swings over the wastes afar,
And those who fail mark the gruesome trail
That sweeps to the polar star.

He hears the song of the martyred throng
And he feels the thrill of their hopes and fears,
The ages dim call out to him
Across the gulf of vanished years.
The parrots scream, in his frenzied dream,
And deep beneath the floe
He sees the hosts on the tropic coasts
Of a million years ago.

The spicy breeze sings in the trees,
The infant world knows not a care.
The lions call, when the shadows fall
O'er the mammoth's reedy lair.
With spears of gold the clans of old
Follow the chase with bated breath,
With instinct sure, they take the spoor,
Sounding the rally-call of death.

He stands alone, in the frozen zone,
Where the bleak skies bend o'erhead;
He drinks a toast to the barren coast
And the North-god's martyred dead.
He joins hands with the voiceless bands
Where the ancient city stood.
He takes the Degree of the Frozen Sea
With the Silent Brotherhood.

CHART PITT.

Northland Camp

THE lazy shadows of Winter creep
Where the lonely hills of the Northland sleep;
The cold wind plays where the snow-drifts lie,
A pallid waste 'neath the Arctic sky.

We sing our songs by the campfire's blaze—
Songs we learned in the olden days;
Dreaming our dreams when the wild geese bring
A word of hope from the coming Spring.

A COLLEGE OF COMMERCE TO TRAIN MEN FOR BUSINESS

Endowed with Half a Million Dollars, It Aims to Develop in America the Best Equipped Business Men the World Has Ever Known.

By Edward Marshall.

EDUCATION planned to develop in America the best equipped business men the world has ever known will be the aim of the College of Commerce, endowed with half a million dollars, the gift of which, presumably from Jacob H. Schiff, was announced at last week's Chamber of Commerce meeting.

Dr. John H. Finley, State Commissioner of Education; Hon. David F. Houston, Secretary of Agriculture; Dean Joseph F. Johnson of the New York University School of Commerce, and others were advisers of the Committee on Commercial Education, headed by Mortimer M. Schiff, which exhaustively investigated the advisability of an institution of which the chief energies would be devoted to instruction in commercial subjects.

In addition t[o] [th]is fund of $500,000, four individual pledges of $50,000 each have been secured.

It is estimated that a suitable building will cost half a million dollars and the unidentified donor of the principal sum stipulates that his gift shall be used for its construction; the additional $200,000 will be devoted to the installation of a commercial and civic museum, and it is suggested that the City of New York shall enter into a contract with the Chamber of Commerce for the support of both institutions.

It is further suggested that the college be operated under the joint management of the College of the City of New York and the Chamber of Commerce.

The museum, according to the present plans, is to follow the general scheme of the Deutches Museum, in Munich, and is to include a civic museum, serving as a laboratory for young men studying for the public service. The probable location of the institution is the old Lexington Avenue site of the City College.

I had a long talk with Dean Johnson the other evening, during which he discussed the need for such an institution in the United States and called attention to the obvious fact that New York City is its logical location. Of course, many details as to the proposed institution's plan and scope remain unsettled, but in a general way it may be said that it will have practically the same entrance requirements as any ordinary college of arts and sciences, and that completion of its course will lead to the baccalaureate degree; but that practical experience and special knowledge will be permitted to take the place of certain special counts in the entrance examination, thus offering educational advantages and incentives to young men who have been unable to complete high school courses.

Committee's Opinions.

The committee advises a four years' course, which may be completed in three years by those who work with diligence and high intelligence; it suggests that while the entrance requirements should be similar to those of the City College, they should lay especial stress on commercial subjects, as taught in the High School of Commerce; they advise the admission of special students, and that means be used to secure employment for graduates.

The Chamber of Commerce has been considering a College of Commerce for more than two years, the original committee having begun work in November, 1911, with George P. Brett as Chairman.

Mr. Brett went abroad, thoroughly investigating foreign schools, and was succeeded by the late Theodore F. Miller, who died last May.

Mr. Schiff was appointed to his place. Frank A. Vanderlip, Thomas W. Lamont, Alexander C. Humphries, Edward A. C. Smith, and Clark Williams are other members of the committee.

"The demand for such an institution in this city," said Dean Johnson, "has been plainly indicated by the experience of the New York University's School of Commerce. Since 1900 this school's activities have increased until now, of evenings, three floors are lighted for it in the university building at Washington Square.

"Charles Waldo Haskins was the first dean of the existing institution, which began with sixty students and now has 2,200.

"This increase of attendance is significant; that the new institution is so nearly an assured fact is significant.

"Taken in conjunction, they indicate that there has been an improvement in the business tone of the United States—improvement in our business ethics, increase in our business efficiency. They are very hopeful signs.

"Dean Haskins's early announcement was that he wished to make accounting a profession rather than a business. Bookkeeping bears the same relation to accounting that carpentry does to architecture.

"About 1896, through the efforts of Dean Haskins and others, New York State passed a law requiring State examinations for certified public accountants. The Dean was a man of far sight and public spirit. I think he first unsuccessfully applied to Columbia for help in starting the institution, but Chancellor MacCracken of New York University indorsed the plan after he had been assured that the university should be under no expense save that of furnishing rooms for the school, and under no obligation save that of giving its degrees.

"Dean Haskins saw the necessity ror training men in the really broad science of business—in banking, in commercial law, in organization, in corporation finance. He saw that a certified public accountant should be an expert adviser of his client, that he should be able to intelligently advise not only in regard to profits, costs, and accounts, but that he should be able to show why a client was making a loss or making a profit.

"He saw the necessity for some one whom the business man could call in for this work, as he calls in the lawyer for other tasks; he recognized the business world's need of some one who could tell the puzzled merchant and manufacturer what plans had been tried and whether they had failed or won, and why, and so on.

"That was the beginning. The new institution will go further. But the original Haskins idea was enough on which to start a school, and a useful school.

"In Harvard I had chosen a classical course, with metaphysics as an elective, and knew something about Greece and Rome; I had absorbed some German philosophy. But I knew precious little about the world I was to live in, or the fight which I would have to make in it. It is a fact that when I was graduated from Harvard, in 1878, I did not know who was President of the United States. I had been busy with the Roman Emperors.

"Of course this was partly my own fault, but the point is that it was not wholly my own fault.

"I did no educational work until 1893, when I went to the Wharton School, which was connected with the University of Pennsylvania, having been founded in 1882 or 1883 by Joseph Wharton, a stalwart American of the Abraham Lincoln type and known as the 'Nickel King.'

"Edward J. James, now President of the University of Illinois, had been called to be a Director of the institution. He was an educational pioneer, always on the frontier of educational thought, always a target for educational standpatters. Mr. Wharton, who believed that American colleges were doing little to fit boys for real business life, undoubtedly selected James because of these very qualities.

"Many hands had risen in horror when the Wharton deed of gift had been made public. The fact that the school proposed to train men to be good citizens by first training them to be good business men, and the fact that especial attention was to be paid to bookkeeping caused much criticism. Bookkeeping in a university! It was indeed an innovation; it rattled some dry bones.

"But there were those who recognized that growth of business colleges alongside of our public schools and universities meant that something which was really essential had been omitted from the public school and university courses.

"Plainly an important detail was lacking from our educational system. Most youths in this country needed something more than they were getting. The need still generally exists.

"The Wharton School had a hard fight. It was opposed by practically every one in the university except Dr. William Pepper, the provost. He was one of the greatest executives who have ever served at the head of a university. He backed the Wharton School.

"After my graduation from college until I joined the teaching force of the Wharton School I had been doing newspaper work in Chicago. This was during the Yerkes régime there, and my journalistic work had taught me much about the ways of promoters.

"James's belief that this especial knowledge would be useful to the school was his reason for calling me to Philadelphia. The training necessary for the position which he wished me to establish in the Wharton School did not exist in the United States or elsewhere outside the offices of newspapers.

"My welcome was mixed. For ten years those in the university called me a newspaper man, while those outside called me a professor. I had no standing anywhere. But it was interesting.

Gage's View of Bankers.

"Among the things which newspaper work had taught me was knowledge of the fact that American bankers know little of finance. Once, in 1887, I interviewed Lyman J. Gage, in an effort to get material for an editorial upon the subject of the silver dollar, and he told me that American bankers were ignorant of the money question, but knew all 'about local credits. Later I had proved this to my own satisfaction.

"I remembered it when I went into the Wharton School. Presently I learned, also, that the business men of the United States knew little of the laws of business.

"That impressed me. It was plain from evidence on every hand that business here had never been given recognition as a science.

"No textbooks were in use which took the thing up properly. 'Mill's Political Economy,' for example, is hypothetical; it does not explain business as it is ordinarily done, but as it might be done in a world where all men were governed by self-interest.

"No such world ever has existed, no considerable society ever has existed in which this was the case.

"We wished to create in the Wharton School courses which would actually help. From 1873 to 1877 there was a constant drop of prices. Wheat fell from $2 a bushel to 50 cents a bushel. But debts remained as big as ever.

"Few men knew the reason.

"Since 1897 there has been a constant rise of prices. Our business men fight it or encourage it, gain through it or are ruined by it; they cannot analyze it.

"There was work, then, for the Wharton School; there will be work, and plenty of it, for the new institution.

"What a business man must do if he is to be really and certainly successful is to foresee.

"We have no system of education for the man who wishes to foresee in business, although we teach foresight in other things. Our engineers are taught what strain a bridge can bear; our business youth get no instruction as to what strain a business can endure without disaster.

"We teach the science of building skyscrapers which will stand; we forbid erection of any structure not rightly planned on good foundations or improperly constructed.

"But we let men without special training build businesses without expert examination of their plans, and when they crash, the suffering of the community is in a way as great and far wider spread than when a building falls.

"Applied economics—that has not been taught in the American Colleges. That is the splendid opportunity of the new school planned by Mr. Schiff and his associates.

"The keynote of American education should be usefulness to all the people. Especially should this be the educational keynote of the new College of Commerce. More than any other kind of education is this kind needed in this country. Men must be taught how to do big business on ethical principles. Many in the United States have gone wrong because they had not had an educational opportunity to learn how to stay straight while accomplishing great things.

"The only high financing methods made known to the public have been those of men who through them have earned criticism; the aspiring youth has been unable to get instruction in any other methods, and may very well have been inclined to try these on the chance that he might be a little cleverer at them than his predecessors, who had met disaster.

"The need for proper, ethical business training in American colleges has been very great; the lack of it has been a melancholy thing.

"That ambitious men have frequently gone wrong because they did not know how to go right has been disastrous to us; that many have done wrong while thinking that they were not doing wrong, but right, has been a national handicap.

"We must teach youth how to make a living as well as how to live. Has anything ever been less intelligent than the fact that our instruction in the art of making a living has been designed mainly for those who wish to follow the professions?

"Can business really be taught? Why not? Is business a higher and more personal art than medicine, or law, or painting? All those are taught. Men say: 'The best school for business is the office.' Is the best school for medicine the sick room?

"Here in the New York University School of Commerce we can point to many real business life successes as the result of educational training. Most of our young men do well; those with especial ability do well much sooner than they would without our training, for they save years of blundering through unsystematized experience.

"A college boy came here six years ago who knew nothing of business or finance; he did not know the difference between stocks and bonds; he did not know the nature of a mortgage. Yet bear in mind—he was a college graduate.

"He was poor, but well bred. He conceived, the idea of going into the bond business, and came to us with that definite plan. We were to fit him to get a job.

"He took courses in finance for two years and, meantime, got work in a bond house at $8 a week. Before his college work was finished he had been promoted to the post he coveted—the bond desk.

"We had urged him to keep calm and not 'show off,' but he had been telling fellows in the office, even members of the firm, things they did not know about their own business. That was what we had succeeded, here, in teaching him.

"Three years ago a big private banking house wanted a trained young man for a special mission in Europe. Such men are very hard to find—they are harder to discover than men to take up legal work or medical work, for we have been overstocking the doctor and lawyer markets and understocking the business market, despite our reputation of being the world's most commercial nation.

"The bankers came to us and asked if we knew any one. We did know a young man. They offered him $5,000 salary to begin with. This is a business school and I knew he was worth more, for the supply of such men does not equal the demand. So I told him to ask $6,000 and commissions. He did so and they gave it.

"This was the immediate result of business training. Of course, his personality helped, but so does that of the medical student who becomes a successful physician.

"Our graduate remained in Europe eighteen months or so and then returned to become manager of the bond department of one of our biggest banking institutions. He now draws $15,000 salary in New York City and is climbing. If the New York University course had not existed he could not have done this.

"He came to me not many months ago. He wanted for his house a certain bond issue which was about to be assigned to other houses at 94½, although the bonds were gilt-edged. Said he:

Theories in Real Life.

"'You told us, here, about rate of interest cycles. We are logically at the beginning of a cycle of a lower interest rate. I'm going to telephone the banking house (it was one of the best known houses in the world) that I'll pay 94⅝ or 95 for those bonds.

"I smiled. He remembered what we had told him. He was making practical application of good business theory.

"'You're all right,' I assured him. 'Go ahead.'

"Next day he telephoned me that he had secured the entire issue for his house. It was a triumph.

"By the way, in order to secure them, he had personally interviewed one of the greatest financial figures in the world. We teach here that a man can see any one if he wants to—that is, if he wants to hard enough.

"I had suggested to this young man that he go and live out in the country, come in daily on the same train with the financier and watch for his chance. He found it the first day and so interested him that they talked together in dead earnest for an hour.

"You see, he knew that interest was so high it must come down, and that bond values would go up. He knew that to be as certain as that a dry season will soon be followed by a wet season. He had learned that in the New York University business course.

"A Yale man untrained in business was brought to us by his friends. He had tried insurance and failed. Only geniuses can sell insurance. People do not want it, any more than they want religion.

"I tried for six months to find a job for him, but there were no vacancies in the game. All the positions in the nine and all the bases were full.

"That is, they seemed to be. As a matter of fact there are always more good jobs than there are good men. I know of dozens of $10,000 jobs, but I know few $10,000 men. I have a standing order for good men from several concerns, among them one of the biggest banks in the country. That is how full the nines and bases really are.

"I turned the Yale man over to Hotchkiss, one of our teachers of business English and advertising. He gave him a letter to a trade paper. They couldn't use him in their office because he didn't know the business, but they put him on the road to learn it.

"In six months he will learn the A. B. C.'s. I think he will pan out. I hope so. If he does it will not be because he is a college graduate.

"With us every course has to have a job on the end of it. My lecture on pedagogy to young teachers is: 'First, make the men feel sure that they are getting something; second, give them something, if you can; third, always relate your instruction to actual business affairs. This is your problem: What do you know that will help these men to make a living?

"'When considering the transportation group, think transportation; when considering the banking group, think banking; when considering the corporation finance group, think corporation finance.

"'Don't talk in the air. This is a practical school for practical men.'

"Cost accounting, corporation finance, money and banking, investment and speculation, can be as definitely taught as languages; it is possible to reason about them, because they are based on principles as definite as those of physics.

"Is there interest in our school which indicates a certainty of interest in the new school? Well, no one has given us any money. We are supported by tuition fees. That answers your question. Last year we took in $112,000 from 1,800 students; we shall probably take in $140,000 this year

"We have had no time to go around begging from rich men, but they ought to help us.

"When you consider that New York City is the financial and commercial capital of the New World and that this country suffers from periodical panics; when you consider that we have been forced to go abroad for trained workers in manufactures, and so on; when you consider that this is the only country in the world that is having trouble from trusts and that sort of thing, because our law-makers don't understand business problems; when you understand that we, alone, of all the world, are afraid of 'big business' as the Lilliputians were afraid of Gulliver, because we don't understand how to get hold of it and make it work for us and can only tie it down to our own and its great loss—when you realize these things you see the vital need for more schools like the proposed College of Commerce.

"It would even have its influence on legislation. Our business laws don't work because they have been drafted by men who know but little about business. Lawyers drew the Sherman act.

"There is no such trouble in Germany, where business men are trained through courses in commercial education. They began before we did and have gone further, not especially in manual training, but surely in industrial training.

"One of Berlin's leading bankers is a nephew of Schopenhauer, the philosopher. No odium attaches to business in the Old World—that is, no odium attaches to big business. Big business men are big men there, because they are trained men.

"New York City is pre-eminently the place where business should be taught.

"The country is on the eve of unprecedented commercial development through the Panama Canal and other mighty influences. We are face to face with things of which we know nothing.

"We have not been half as wise as we believe we have been. New York has made money by swapping goods with California and Maine. We have had free trade among ourselves. We have feared and shut away the competition of the balance of the world.

"Lowell said he would put two Yankees on a rock, let them swap jackknives all day, and prove that when the evening came each would have made $5. That has been American business.

"But now we must do business with the world. We must develop shipping. We must have young men who understand foreign exchange; our young men must be as well trained as those of Germany in the technique of commerce.

"Canadian bankers lend money all over the Dominion; London bankers lend money all over the world; our national bankers lend money only in their own neighborhoods. Our national bankers are not national bankers, as they stand; but they must become international bankers.

"Perhaps we need no institution more than one which will train young men in international banking, because the time is close at hand when we shall have to get down on our marrow-bones and compete for business with the trained men of Europe. We can now compete with foreign engineers; we must be able to compete with foreign bankers.

"New York University plans to establish here technical schools offering courses in commerce and finance and also giving enough technical knowledge to enable students to adapt the commerce and finance they learn to such especial lines as they may elect to follow.

Conditions of To-day.

"Some students will think of themselves as commercial men, but will get courses in applied engineering which will enable them to know, later, if engineers are fooling them when building bridges for them.

"Our past great business men—those who built our railroads, who refine our sugar and oil, who invented our trusts—did not entirely rely on others for their technical knowledge. But times have changed.

"There is less possibility than there used to be of really learning any business by seeking employment in it, for specialization has departmentalized our businesses until few employes can get the instructive bird's-eye view of a large enterprise which once was possible. They must get their bird's-eye view before they begin work at their desks.

"We want our school of commerce to be national. The laboratory is logically here. All that is being done in the United States, barring some tropical agriculture, is being done in some degree within fifty miles of New York City.

"This is the centre of manufacturing, of real estate, commerce. It is the only place in the United States which offers any real opportunity for the study of finance.

"It is the head of our financial system. St. Louis may be its legs, Chicago its stomach, and Oklahoma its little toe, but surely New York is its head.

"They all look to us. We must not disappoint them. By disappointing them we cheat ourselves. Panics and good times are first built here. Incidentally, in the New York University School of Commerce we use THE TIMES ANNALIST as a textbook. It is admirable.

"Because we want a national school of commerce here I warmly support the Chamber of Commerce plan, although none of us regrets the gifts to the City College. We want money from the nation and students from the nation.

"Twenty-five years from now the best salesmen in the country, the best advertising men in the country, the best bankers, best bond dealers, best business organizers, our leaders in trade journalism, our captains of industry in general will be college men—Commerce College men. They will be graduates of schools like that we now have here at New York University and like that which is proposed."

THINGS HEARD HERE AND THERE

Our Well-Known Coney.

EVEN if they would, few Americans can escape the reflected glory of Coney Island. A New York tourist found that out as far away from home as Antwerp.

While lounging on an Antwerp pier he got mixed up with a lot of excursionists who had disembarked from a Hull steamer. The hackmen who were on hand to drive the Hull trippers about the city grew impatient with the methodical manner in which they sorted themselves out.

"Here, you Hull folk," one of them called out in first rate English, "hurry up here, if you want to see Antwerp in three hours."

The New York tourist happened to be in the centre of the group addressed, and he resented the wholesale classification.

"Don't you believe for one minute that I come from Hull," he said.

The hackman looked him over serenely.

"Oh, I know you don't," he said in his excellent English. "I know where you come from."

"Where?" said the New Yorker.

"Coney Island," said the man, and turned his attention to the real natives of Hull.

The Limit.

AFTER standing by for fifteen minutes listening to the stream of questions put to a policeman at a busy corner, the woman said:

"Don't you get awfully tired of answering all these fool questions that are put to you hour after hour?"

"Well, rather," said he. "Still, I've got so used to it that there is only one of the lot that makes me actually boil."

"Which one is that?" she inquired.

"Don't I get awfully tired of answering all the fool questions that other folks ask?"

"Oh!" said the woman, and hurried on.

Aboard Ship.

Steward—A Marconigram for you, Miss.

Pretty Girl—Just ask them to hold the wire.

Just as Effective.

COLONEL PRESTON of Grand Beach, Me., tells this story about a new chauffeur he added to his household this year.

Pat's knowledge of auto mechanics is surprising, but like many another man he despises his vocation and yearns to be a sportsman. The Colonel possesses a collection of firearms of which he is proud and this has been a continual attraction for Pat, who spends much of his spare time gazing in admiration at the guns in their glass cases and gently fingering them with loving care when permitted to polish them.

One day he came to the Colonel very bashfully and inquired, "Colonel, dear, would yez be lettin' me hov th' loan av this wan for this afternoon?"

The piece was an old muzzle-loader of civil war days, and his master, thinking that Pat wanted to play a joke on some one, and knowing that the gun could not possibly be fired, readily consented.

Toward evening he observed Pat, arrayed in full automobile toggery, trudging off toward the woods with the gun on his shoulder.

"Where are you going, Pat?" asked the Colonel.

"Shure, sir, an' O'm goin' ter hunt rabbits in th' woods beyant."

"But that gun is no good; it has been out of order for twenty years!"

"Faith thot may be, Sir; but shure th' rabbits won't know that!"

Fighting Piano Moths.

IT wasn't the rent he was after, the piano man said; he just wanted to fix the piano, that was all.

"Tune it, do you mean?" the woman asked.

"Oh, no," said he, "to fight the moths."

Then he opened the case and tied little bags of camphor in the corners.

"We do that two or three times a year with all our rented pianos," he said. "If some kind of preventive is not used there is danger of moths getting into the felt back of the keyboard. We can't depend upon the renters to attend to that little job for us, so we send one of our own men around."

Its Use.

Knicker—They can now take photographs under the sea.

Bocker—To show the size of the fish that got away.

ENGLISH PEER, ONCE A PROSPECTOR HERE, TURNS MOSLEM

Lord Headley's Conversion to Islam Focuses Attention Not Only on His Adventurous Career But on Other Well-Known Persons Who Have Embraced Faiths of the East.

By a Veteran Diplomat.

SINCE the death of the late Lord Stanley of Alderley, just ten years ago, the British House of Lords—supreme tribunal of the Empire—while boasting of a Buddhist Earl, in the person of Lord Mexborough, has had no Moslem peer to represent in its councils a religion professed by nearly 100,000,000 lieges of the British crown. This rôle will henceforth be filled by Lord Headley, who last week made a public profession of the fact that he had embraced the tenets of Islam, and had seceded from Christianity

Whereas in olden times an apostasy of this kind would have been punished as an atrocious crime, it is nowadays regarded in the light of a harmless eccentricity, denoting some abnormality of a possibly brilliant mind. True, among the English officials of the civil service of India, it is visited with dismissal, and would doubtless cost any officer of the army, the navy, or the diplomatic corps his commission. But this is merely a matter of discipline.

There are no longer any legal penalties. It does not even entail the loss of the patronage of livings of the Established Church of England; and whereas, by laws dating from the time of the Reformation, conversion to Roman Catholicism involves the suspension of all inherited or purchased advowsons, a peer may become a Mohammedan, a Buddhist, or may publicly proclaim himself an Atheist, like the late Marquis of Queensberry, without forfeiting his right to select and appoint the rectors and vicars of often large and populous parishes—permitted therefore by the State to retain his responsibility for the spiritual welfare of the parishioners.

While Great Britain and all other Western powers—save Russia—tolerate conversions such as that of Lord Headley, they sternly refuse to allow the legal status of the person concerned to become in any way modified by his change of faith. Whereas polygamy is permitted by the European Governments to Orientals born and reared as Moslems, Lord Headley would be promptly arrested by the police and tried, like the Earl Russell, by the House of Lords for bigamy, if he attempted to avail himself of the privilege accorded by Mohammed to true believers, to indulge in a plurality of wives. Indeed, I can recall the case of an Englishman holding high official position in India, who, having adopted Mohammedanism in order to enable him to wed a second wife while he had a first one living, from whom he was unable to secure his release, was first of all dismissed from the service of the Crown and then sentenced to a term of imprisonment for bigamy.

An Austrian Moslem.

Other European nations are more lenient, however, provided the plurality of wives is restricted to the Orient and is not flaunted unduly in Western lands. Thus, among my several apostate friends, perhaps the most interesting, and certainly the most entertaining of all, was one who at Constantinople and at Cairo was known as Sefer Pasha, and on his estates in Austria as Count Koscielski.

While holding the rank of Lieutenant Colonel in the Prussian Army he had the misfortune to kill in a duel his commanding officer, Count Kleist. This led him to expatriate himself, and, joining the Turkish Army, he distinguished himself during the Crimean war as a member of the staff of the Ottoman Commander in Chief, Omar Pasha.

Subsequently the Count, who during the campaign had won his epaulettes of General, became a convert to Islam, under the name of Sefer Pasha, and, while retaining his position as aid de camp to the Sultan, became Master of the Horse to Khedive Ismail of Egypt, whom he used invariably to accompany to the mosque every Friday, practicing the Mohammedan rites in the most devout manner when in Turkey or in the land of the Nile.

At Constantinople, and afterward at Cairo, where I learned to know him, he availed himself of his prerogatives as a Moslem to indulge in the plurality of wives authorized by the Koran, and maintained a magnificent harem, with its full complement of odalisques and eunuchs.

These ladies, however, would be left behind when he took his departure at the end of Spring to spend the hot Summer months as Count Koscielski on his estates in Austria, and while staying at his wonderfully picturesque castle of Perstein, in Styria, he would make a point of attending mass every Sunday, inviting the Bishop and the parish priests to dinner, and taking an active interest in the religious instruction and welfare of the peasants in the numerous villages on his property.

I have often wondered what these worthy divines would have said had they had the slightest inkling of his mode of life, and of his devoutness as a Moslem during the remainder of the year in the Orient.

Tall, with a short gray beard, and with an aquiline cut of features, he was a brilliant conversationalist, possessed of an inexhaustible fund of anecdote, with all the distinction and charming manners of the Poles of high degree, and at the same time with a sort of cynical indifference to the qu'en dira-te-on.

It was not hypocrisy that led him to affect devout Mohammedanism at Constantinople and at Cairo, and equally fervent Christianity when spending his Summers in Austria, but a wish to conduct himself in a fitting manner, and to set a good example as a high Turkish and Egyptian dignitary in the Levant, and as a great Polish noble on his family estates in Europe. Knowing the man intimately as I did, I am perfectly convinced that he was just as sincere a Moslem at Cairo as a Christian at his castle of Perstein, and that what would have been a piece of glaring inconsistency in any one else was perfectly natural in him.

He died some twenty years ago at his castle of Perstein, and was buried as a Christian. Had his demise occurred in Egypt, he would without doubt have been interred there with full Moslem rites.

With regard to Omar Pasha—mentioned above—the most distinguished Turkish General of the nineteenth century, and the Generalissimo of the Ottoman forces during the Crimean war, he was a Hungarian by birth, and had served in the Austrian Army under the name of Mikail von Lattas. Becoming involved in some scrape while holding the rank of Lieutenant, and confronted with court-martial, he deserted, fled to Turkey, where he had the good fortune, after embracing Islam, to secure a position in the household of the then heir apparent, Abdul Medjid. When the latter succeeded to the throne ex-Lieut. Lattas, who had meanwhile become Omar Bey, was advanced rapidly from one post to another until he became Commander in Chief of the Ottoman Army and invested with the highest dignities of the realm.

Read Three Death Notices.

As for Lord Headley, his conversion to Islam marks the culmination of a career of much adventure and of interest, and he has enjoyed the, I suppose, well-nigh unique advantage of reading his obituaries at no less than three different periods of his life. Indeed, he has been so often reported as dead that when he is ultimately gathered to his fathers it will require something more than mere newspaper announcements to carry conviction of his demise.

He is not unknown in the United States, has spent much time prospecting in Montana, Idaho, Wyoming, and other Western States, also in the Northwest of Canada; served through the Franco-German war on the staff of his friend the Prussian General von Goeben, fought beside the late Lord Ashburnham for the late Don Carlos in the several Carlist insurrections in Spain some forty years ago, and also figured on the Turkish side in the Turko-Russian war, which was brought to a close by the treaty of San Stefano and the Congress of Berlin.

At one time, around about 1892, he was missing three years in Central Africa. He had started out north of the Zambesi River on a shooting expedition consisting of but six people besides himself, narrowly escaped being eaten by cannibals, penetrated regions where no white man had ever set foot before, killed with his own gun no less than eighteen rhinoceri, a dozen lions, and several elephants, and then, after having been long given up as dead, unexpectedly reappeared, to take his seat, just as if nothing had happened, as a representative peer of Ireland in the House of Lords.

Slept as Do the Homeless.

Although nominally possessed of some 16,000 acres of land in Ireland, yet, owing to the embarrassed condition of his property, he has been, at times, in such financial straits, especially after the failure of some of his mining ventures, that he has known what it was to spend his nights on the Thames Embankment for lack of the price of a night's lodging; and when ultimately he was able to sell his Irish estates to the tenants under the terms of the Land act, he received but little from the transaction, owing to the mortgages with which they were burdened. That little went to his invalid wife. When I saw him last he was a cheery looking, fresh-colored man, strong in build, not very tall, slightly deaf, and with mustache and hair that were then gray, and are now probably white. Having no son, his three Irish peerages and his ancient Baronetcy will go at his death to his cousin, Rowland Winn, a notable sportsman, who, when at Cambridge, won the middle and heavyweight championships at boxing, and has written several standard works on the art of self-defense. A civil engineer by profession, he is recognized as the principal authority in England on the protection and improvement of foreshores and on harbor construction.

The late Lord Stanley of Alderley, who was buried in England in unconsecrated ground ten years ago, with full Moslem rites, the only instance on record of the funeral of a peer of the realm under such circumstances, was also a very interesting man, though in his later years he developed an irascibility which did not precisely suggest the fatalist calm for which the followers of the Prophet are so distinguished. He commenced his career in diplomacy, but after about ten years abandoned it, in order to escape its trammels, and contracted a romantic marriage in 1861 in Switzerland with Dona Fabia Fernandez y Funes of Madrid, who was stated to be the widow of a Spanish nobleman, Don Ramon Perez y Abril.

For the next fourteen years the couple mingled freely in English and Continental society, the lady being received at the Court of St. James's, and also at Continental Courts, as a peeress of the realm. It was not until 1874 that the indiscreet revelation of the fact that another marriage between the two had taken place on May 15 of that year, also in Switzerland, brought to light the circumstance that the first marriage had been invalid, owing to Lady Stanley of Alderley's first husband being alive at the time. It was only when he died, in 1874, that she was really able to legalize her relations with Lord Stanley. Fortunately there were no children born to the union.

Subsequently, she became insane, and being cared for by her Spanish relatives—she was a woman of considerable fortune—passed out of the life of Lord Stanley of Alderley, and out of the ken of English society, surviving him by two years. After her death there were lawsuits at Madrid in connection with the testamentary dispositions of her property in Spain.

Lord Stanley of Alderley's conversion to Islam was brought about in the early eighties by his intimacy with Sultan Abdul Hamid, whose principal champion he became in the House of Lords and in the columns of The London Times, to which he contributed many interesting "letters to the editor." He was particularly vigorous in his defense of the Sultan's treatment of Midhat Pasha, and was able to furnish abundant evidence of the fact that Sultan Abdul Aziz, instead of having committed suicide, as officially stated by Midhat, who was Grand Vizier at the time, had been murdered in a particularly shocking fashion by a palace employe known as Mustapha the Wrestler, at the instigation and by the orders of Midhat.

Is the Result of Thought.

Lord Mexborough's conversion to Buddhism is not so much a matter of eccentricity as of study and of travel. For the Earl, if a crank in some respects, is a man of wide learning and culture, and has wandered all over the world, especially in the Orient, like his father. The latter is familiar to most American admirers of Kinglake as the most intimate friend and traveling companion of that author, and indeed figures in his popular book "Eothen" under the transparent pseudonym of "Methley," the latter being the name of the principal country seat of the Lords of Mexborough, near Leeds.

Built in 1590 by Sir John Savile, Judge of the Court of the Exchequer, under the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and founder of the Mexborough branch of the historic house of Savile, Methley has been in the possession of the family ever since. Among its features are the queer old powder rooms. They are a species of cupboards, a little larger than telephone booths, to which men and women in olden times retired in order to be subjected to the powdering of their wigs and of their hair. Very few of the old-time mansions have retained them, and they are so scarce nowadays that even where they do survive their use is forgotten.

Lord Mexborough's sister, Lady Anne Savile, widow of that Prince Louis of Loewenstein-Wertheim who succumbed to an American bullet in the Philippines while fighting in the ranks of the Aguinaldo insurgents, is a frequent visitor to New York and a familiar figure in certain circles of New York society.

Nor among the Buddhists who find a place in the pages of Burke's "Peerage," must I omit the name of the Marquis of Queensberry's sister, Lady Edith Douglas, married to a son of the late Gen. Fox-Pitt Rivers of Rushmore, Wiltshire, a professed Buddhist, like herself.

Among some German distant cousins of mine are the Bavarian Barons von Staudach, several of whom belong to the Shiite branch of the Moslem faith, and either hold office or are married in Persia. Thus, Baroness Amelia von Staudach was married about eight years ago at Teheran, according to Moslem rites, to a younger brother of the ex-Shah, and is now known as Madjie Sultana.

Another sister, the Baroness Francisca von Staudach, is known at Teheran as Fatmeh Sultana, and is the principal wife of Gen. Suleiman Khan, head of the Imperial Arsenal; while a brother, christened as Victor, Baron von Staudach, is now Abdul Rahman Khan, married to Princess Tadschel Muluk, a daughter of the ex-Shah.

They are all the children of the late Baron Francis von Staudach, who, migrating to Teheran with his wife and children in response to an invitation to enter the military service of Shah Nasr-Eddin and to assist in the organization of his army, became a convert to Islam, taking a Persian name, his children following his example, although his wife remained true to the Catholic faith in which she had been reared.

When at Hongkong, in 1874, I was presented by old Sir Arthur Kennedy, then Governor of that colony, to a gorgeously arrayed naval officer, who held the rank of Admiral in Chief of the Siamese fleet, and who was in command of a couple of Siamese warships in port.

He bore an unpronounceable Siamese name, about twenty-four syllables in length. But I soon discovered that he spoke French as his mother tongue, and that his original patronymic was the very Gallic one of Dupont.

He began life as a sailor before the mast, on board a French man of war. One day while in port, at Reunion, he had been unjustly struck by one of the officers, and had responded by felling his assailant to the deck. Realizing that this offense involved the penalty of death, he at once threw himself overboard, and was believed by everybody on the cruiser to have been drowned. Instead of this, he managed to swim to an East Indiaman that was in the act of raising anchor, and to clamber on board.

After drifting about from one Indian port to another, he finally reached Bangkok, where he entered the Siamese Navy, then in course of formation, and soon acquired high rank and influence. He became a convert to Buddhism, married a Siamese woman, by whom he had several sons, who occupy to-day important offices in the King's service, and eventually died at Bangkok, being buried there with the pomp and ceremony befitting his rank, according to Buddhist rites.

Mehemet Ali Pasha, after taking part in the Russo-Turkish war of 1877, was sent by the Sultan as one of the Ottoman plenipotentiaries to the Congress of 1878 at Berlin, much to the indignation of Prince Bismarck, who treated him with the most marked contempt and rudeness. For at one time he had held a commission as Lieutenant of the Emperor Alexander Regiment of Prussian Foot Guards at Berlin, and had deserted sooner than face a court-martial after becoming involved in some unsavory scrape. In fact, his diplomatic prerogatives alone saved him from being arrested by the Prussian military authorities as a deserter when he arrived in Berlin to attend the congress. It may be remembered that he was assassinated in Albania two years afterward.

Then there was my old friend Nouri Pasha, the most remarkable of the Turkish plenipotentiaries of the Peace Congress of The Hague in 1899, and previously Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to the Sublime Porte. He was the head of an old French family, and was entitled to style himself the Marquis de Blosset de Chateauneuf.

Nouri's father had gone to Turkey from France in connection with some railroad contracts, and, yielding to the urgent requests of Abdul Aziz to enter his service, became a convert to Islam, and died in the favor of the Padishah as Rechad Pasha. His only son, born and reared in France as a Christian, followed his father into the Moslem fold, and into the Ottoman service, and owing to his charm of manner and his knowledge of the world became in course of time the principal channel through which communications were carried on between the foreign Embassies and Legations and the Sublime Porte.

Heroines of a Novel.

His two daughters having too much French blood in their veins to be content with the restrictions of Oriental harem life, fled about five years ago from Constantinople, escorted only by their old French governess, and sought refuge in Paris, where they were thrown much in contact with Pierre Loti, and the story of their life at Stamboul furnished him with the theme for his novel, "The Disenchanted."

Nouri Pasha died some months after their flight at Stamboul in such a sudden manner as to convey the impression that he had succumbed to poison administered to him by some of his foes at the Yildiz Kiosk, who were jealous of the confidence reposed in his integrity by Sultan Abdul Hamid.

Among the warmest friends of Sir Richard Burton, the famous African explorer and Oriental writer, when stationed at Damascus as British Consul with his wife, Countess Isabel Arundel of Wardour, was the ex-Countess of Ellenborough. She was a daughter of Admiral Digby of the family of Lord Digby and a granddaughter on her mother's side of the Earl of Leicester, and was married at the age of seventeen to the Earl of Ellenborough, Viceroy of India.

He divorced her for eloping with Prince Schwarzenburg, Secretary of the Austrian Embassy in London. She became in turn the favorite of Leopold I of Belgium, and of Louis I of Bavaria, her portrait figuring in that unique collection of paintings that adorn the walls of the so-called Beauty Salôn of the old palace of the reigning house at Munich.

After three years' marriage with the Saxon Baron Venningen, she eloped from Germany to Athens with a Greek student of the name of Theodoki, whom she had met at Heidelberg, remained at Athens long enough to enable him to blow his brains out, and for herself to pose to Parepolus for his lovely statue of Venus, which figures in the public museum there to-day, and thence proceeded to Palestine. There, emulating the example of Lady Hester Stanhope, niece of the great British Premier William Pitt, she became a Mohammedan, and married a Bedouin chief, Sheikh Mohammed.

Killing Follows Killing.

He was killed by a rival chieftain in attempting to carry her off, and after a brief widowhood she married another Bedouin, the famous Sheikh el Merzab, with whom she went through adventures that read like a fairy tale. He, too, was killed in due course, by a German adventurer of the name of Zerlind, just outside Damascus, and her last husband, whose name, however, does not figure in the pages of "Burke," was a Bedouin camel driver, who had saved her life on several occasions. He proved a faithful and loyal spouse, and it was to him that she left every vestige of her property, when she died, some twenty miles from Damascus, in 1881.

It is perhaps hardly fair to include in this list the name of that gallant Austrian lieutenant of General "Chinese" Gordon, Baron Rudolf Slatin, whose brother is one of the confidential secretaries of Emperor Francis Joseph. For his conversion to Islam was forced upon him against his will during his twelve years of particularly cruel captivity by the Mahdi at Omdurman.

He reverted to Christianity as soon as ever he managed to escape, under most romantic circumstances, from the hands of the Dervishes, and played an important part in the reconquest of the Sudan and in the crushing of the Mahdi under Lord Kitchener. To-day he is Inspector General of the Sudan, in the Anglo-Egyptian service, and is the only foreigner not of royal or imperial birth to enjoy the honorary rank of Major General of the British Army.

Lady Hester Stanhope, daughter of that eccentric Charles, Earl Stanhope, who as a French revolutionist had abjured Christianity to become, along with other French Terrorists, a follower of the Goddess of Reason, also lies buried in Palestine, in the garden of what was her home for so many years on Mount Lebanon.

After the death of her uncle, Prime Minister Pitt, for whom she kept house, and moreover, broken-hearted by the death of her fiancé, Gen. Sir John Moore and of her favorite half-brother, Charles Stanhope at the battle of Corunna, she left England, and spent the remaining thirty years of her life in Palestine.

There, after becoming a convert to Islam, she acquired an extraordinary influence over the natives. Credited by them with supernatural powers, and by the Turkish authorities of the province with a powerful voice in the affairs of the British Empire, she lived in a sort of semi-regal fashion. There is no record that she ever actually married any of the Arab chieftains who were her devoted slaves and blindly obedient to her will and even to this day, although over three score years and ten have passed since her death, her memory is still revered by the natives throughout the entire countryside of Mount Lebanon.

"THERE is a conviction through the country," says a Post Office Department official, "that the departmental business at Washington is more or less hampered by red tape. This conviction is held by many minor employes of the Government in out-of-the-way places, as is evidenced by a story that came to me from New England.

"It appears that there was a postman whose duty it was to bring mail to the few scattered houses on an island off the Atlantic Coast. One day, during a heavy storm, this carrier was seen rowing his boat over. So severe was the storm that several times it seemed that the man would certainly be swamped. Finally, however, he succeeded in reaching his destination.

"'What the deuce made you do that?' demanded a friend when the postman eventually grounded on the beach.

"'It's this way,' was the reply. 'If I miss a trip it is necessary to write an awfully long report to Washington explaining why. So I thought I'd rather row over.'"

Inapplicable.

But this doesn't apply to the crime

"CAMPAIGNS OF RED FIRE AND FRENZY ARE DOOMED"

Robert Adamson, Fusion Manager, Tells of His Election Experience, Declares Present Modes of Vote-Hunting Wasteful and Ridiculous, and Foresees Saner, More Scientific Campaigning.

AMERICAN methods of political campaigning are antiquated and are now doomed. Campaigns of red fire, frenzy and hullabaloo are foolish, unscientific, and inefficient. The modernized campaign, the campaign of the future, will have less of bedlam, but more of issues and of men."

So said Robert Adamson, manager of the Fusion campaign in the election just ended, to a TIMES reporter last week, when asked for elaboration in an interview of his remarks at the Advertising Men's League dinner.

At that banquet Mr. Adamson attracted attention by his statements that "our (meaning Fusion) campaign methods were almost as out of date as Tammany Hall itself," and that "three-quarters of the money spent on the Fusion campaign was wasted."

Besides pointing out what he terms the "absurdities" of old-fashioned modes of political warfare, Mr. Adamson suggested in the interview ways in which he believes the city and State could and should help toward adequate, dignified campaign management.

"Not only are the campaign methods which have come down to us from former days shockingly wasteful in a monetary way," continued Mr. Adamson to the reporter, "but they reflect very little credit on our intelligence. We have advanced far since the old days in political thought, but we haven't advanced a jot in twenty-five years in the means by which we attempt to get the voters to think at election time.

"We get the electorate into an artificial fever of excitement in which no rational discussion or judgment of issues has a place. The ways of campaigning which have come down to us from our fathers, and which we have been blindly following as though we were so stupidly conservative that we couldn't improve, are nothing more nor less than absurd.

"Imagine how ridiculous it is to ask the voters to select between two men, the successful one of whom will have in four years general supervision of the expenditure of nearly $1,000,000,000, on the basis of the arguments contained in bands, bunting, and banners. In place of insane hubbub there ought to be ample opportunity for sane, calm judgment.

To-day's Higher Standard.

"The time is gone for circus campaigns. Those campaigns are passing with the circus national convention. We are now going to see some twentieth century efficiency at work on the problem of running our campaigns along scientific lines, as our other great, serious enterprises are handled. The simple fact is that campaigns are not up to the modern standard of thought, not up to modern notions. Hysteria must give way to efficiency.

"I am glad to say that in the Fusion campaign we did not spend money on a good many things which were advised by old-time politicians, who think that because thousands of dollars were spent on useless splurging twenty years ago, more thousands should be thrown away every election on similar things.

"Nevertheless, though we kept from wasting money in some directions, we did, I am convinced, waste a very large proportion of the campaign fund on useless non-productive forms of campaigning. If I am ever called upon again to manage a campaign I shall cut out virtually everything belonging to the ancient school of campaigners."

The reporter asked Mr. Adamson to give a list of items of expenditure which he believes should have no place in the scientifically handled campaign. The following were thereupon blackballed:

Organized applause at your own meetings.

Organized interruptions at your opponents' meetings.

Financing of "paper" organizations.

Streamers, flags, shields, and other decorations.

Buttons and other campaign insignia for coat lapels.

Red fire.

Banners with candidates' names, strung across streets or anywhere else.

Bands, except perhaps at one or two big rallies.

Posters.

Street car and Subway cards.

Circulars and cards sent by mail.

Sample ballots sent by mail showing voters how to vote the "right" ticket.

Money spent on Election Day.

Money Can Be Saved.

"It is easy to see," continued Mr. Adamson, "by regarding that list of the useless how simple it is to curtail campaign expenses. Take the organized applause, for instance. We, of course, did not go in for that in the Fusion campaign, nor for organized interruptions at rival meetings.

"Nevertheless, there are regular business organizations here in New York each election who will, for a price, do anything you want. They will sell you a ten-minute demonstration at your meeting, or a fifteen-minute outburst of applause, or even an hour's spontaneous, uncontrollable tumult of acclaim. They will also go to your opponent's meeting and ask embarrassing questions or raise a disturbance. Surely, managers who buy such goods as these are throwing money away. What effect on the voting of a great city can a bit of manufactured hand-clapping have? Yet some managers want to break the applause record, so that they will get a headline in the papers next morning. What has that to do with the issues of the campaign?

"Take the 'paper' organizations. In every campaign there are hundreds of fake associations formed, which exist on paper—as a rule, you'd have to get a search warrant to find the membership—and which are financed from the headquarters of the contending parties.

"In the mayoralty campaign we had offers on all sides from men who wanted to form these spurious organizations and to have us finance them. But we didn't go in for that kind of expenditure. These organizations open headquarters of their own, with a few officials and five members, or none, and add to the general racket of the campaign. But what value are they? What have they to do with the grave matters to be decided in each election? Yet the idea that there must be some of these organizations is part of the heritage from old days.

"Let us look at the question of decorations, flags, and streamers. About three weeks before Election Day we had a big Fusion meeting in Carnegie Hall. It was a meeting for the plain discussion of the plain issues of the campaign. And, by the way, I may point out that Mr. Mitchel, Mr. McAneny, and Mr. Prendergast confined themselves throughout the campaign to a discussion of the matters before the voters—to a consideration of constructive plans and not to personalities—and thus showed the modern tendency of which I speak to get away from hippodroming.

"Well, the old politicians were against the Carnegie Hall meeting. They told me Carnegie Hall was a hoodoo and that we couldn't fill it; they said the Republican organization had abandoned it. But I believed that the voters of New York would be glad of a chance to go to a meeting where they could hear a lucid discussion of the things they were to vote on.

"That meeting was a big success. Now, for that meeting we decorated the hall with flags, streamers, bunting, and so on, all in the old-fashioned way. But the day after that meeting I declared that we would abolish flags and decorations at the rest of our gatherings. I said that the decorations in Carnegie Hall had had nothing to do with the success of the rally.

"After that we did not use decorations at the meetings for the mayoralty candidate and the attendance was not affected one whit. The meetings were crowded, and that much money was saved, even if tradition was upset.

"Take the button phase of the old-fashioned campaign. Almost the instant I got into harness as manager the campaign button men arrived to get orders for tens of thousands of buttons. I amazed and dazed them by telling them we didn't want any buttons. I had looked into the button matter and had found that a huge percentage of buttons go to boys. I fail to see, anyway, how a button with a candidate's face on it is going to be a very cogent argument with any very large mass of voters. Some Fusion buttons were distributed in the campaign, but headquarters had nothing to do with them. I consider buttons sheer waste.

"With red fire we're the victims of tradition again. It used to blaze, and therefore should go on with its futile flaming indefinitely. Red fire doesn't decide campaigns, and it is just a burner of cash.

"Well, then, let us touch on the banners, in this roll-call of things foolish.

"We did put out some banners in the recent struggle—banners with candidates' names, stretching across streets—and they cost us $300 apiece. I don't believe they were worth three cents. But we were wise enough to stop at a few, when we were being urged to festoon the whole city with them.

"The old politician was again to the fore. He, in numbers, assured us that black disaster loomed ahead of the Fusion ticket unless we put American flags all over town, with the names of Mr. Mitchel and of the other leading candidates beneath them. 'It's always been done and is absolutely necessary,' I was assured. Each flag would have cost $175, and we could have easily spent $20,000 on flag draping in the style of 1883. I couldn't see that this was going to prove to wavering voters that we had the best of the municipal argument. It didn't appeal to me as an outlay warranted by the science of modern business management. So it wasn't done.

"Then there are the circulars and cards sent by mail. Here is another field of wasted money and effort. Voters find their mail stuffed at election time with circulars, most of which go into the waste paper basket. I was told that I must circularize all the voters in New York, the whole 650,000 of them, and tell them to vote the Fusion ticket. It costs $20,000 to $25,000 every time such circularization is done. I considered it to be throwing away money, and it was not done.

"The old politicians told me: 'You must teach the people how to vote.' I was informed that Tammany had in past years spent hundreds of thousands of dollars instructing voters where to put their marks. We must instruct the voters how to vote Fusion or we would surely be beaten, I was warned.

"I considered this relic of the old style campaign and even got a printing estimate. I found it would cost $17,500 for the printing alone to send a sample ballot to every voter. On analysis of the idea I declared that it wasn't necessary to send voters sample ballots to educate them, and said I was convinced that if there was one thing the voter does know it is how to mark his ballot to achieve any ticket splitting or anything else he may want.

"That the voter does know how to vote was shown strikingly in the Sixth Assembly District where Sulzer was running. They say foreigners can't vote, yet I never saw such discrimination as was exhibited there. Sulzer was put in at the eleventh hour by the Progressives. He was elected by 2,000 plurality, while the Progressive candidate for Alderman was defeated by several hundred. The voters knew how to split a ticket.

Useless Disbursements.

"Another source of waste is the expenditure on election day in the election districts, in each of which it has been the habit for each party to spend from $25 to $50 'to get out the vote.' The money goes to pay watchers at the polls, men who work all year for the party and who keep track to see that all registered members of the party are voting. In the afternoon they get after men who have not yet balloted and try to get them to the polls. Yet, I doubt whether this 'getting out of the vote' makes much difference in an election, and certainly the result of the recent election proved to us that not much money was needed to get the vote out.

"One of the big politicians of the city told me: 'This spending of money on election day is a bad habit, yet the workers look for it during the year and would be much disgruntled if it were not forthcoming.' But this is another relic of the past and should have no place in the properly managed modern campaign."

Mr. Adamson then turned to a discussion of the part he believes Governmental authority should have in improving campaign conditions.

"I think that there should be both municipal and State legislation to help in putting campaigns on a basis of sanity and efficiency," he said. "Provision should be made for the use of public schools and other suitable public buildings, even including the City Hall, by all parties for their meetings during the campaigns. Every party should be treated alike and on the same basis, and these public structures should be turned over for discussion of the questions actually involved in the campaign.

"At meetings in these buildings belonging to the community there would be no red fire, no waving of flags, no artificial frenzy, but there would be plain, calm discussions of the matters of importance which elections are held to settle.

What Might Be Done.

"Dignity would be given to the discussion of the issues at stake. And the great expense of hiring halls would be abolished. It requires $1,000 a night to finance the meetings for the Mayoralty candidate alone. Yet it is of the greatest importance for him to set forth his views, and if public buildings are not made available by legislation for the use of candidates, of course these heavy outlays for rent of halls will have to go on in future campaigns.

"The people would get necessary information at these meetings in public buildings for them to vote intelligently. They also should receive information through circulars distributed by governmental authority and at public expense. Why should not the State take this second step? The Board of Elections now prints ballots and has charge of primary elections. Why should its sphere not be slightly increased, so that it could send through the mails to the voters a statement of the platforms and sketches of the candidates?

"Something of this sort is done in cities where they have the recall, and I mention the recall, by the way, purely for the purpose of drawing a comparison. In these cities the Board of Elections prints on the ballot a statement of his opponents' reasons why the official should be removed, with his statement of why he should not be removed, the statements having equal space. The Board of Elections under my suggestion would be acting in a similar capacity as a mere distributer of information to the voter.

"If these two things were done—namely, school houses and other available public buildings used for meetings on equal terms by all parties, and data on platform and candidates distributed by the Board of Elections—we would take a long stride toward efficiency in campaigns and toward cutting down useless money expenditures. And the public would be well served, for it would get the information it wants through the two sources of meetings and literature.

"Personally I haven't an atom of doubt that this quiet, efficient campaign is coming—that it is coming as surely as the wild, old convention of yells and marching clubs is going, as surely as hysteria is to be divorced from American politics."

FINE POINTS FOR THE WOULD-BE EXPERT IN AUCTION BRIDGE

Motto of the Nullo Player Should Be "Get Out and Get Under," the Getting Out Being the More Important.

By Florence Irwin.

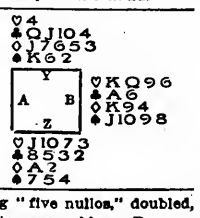
A TOPICAL song which is making a hit in one of the current shows might well furnish a motto to the nullo player. The song is "Get Out and Get Under," and in its original form it is a recital of the woes of the automobile driver who, at every interesting crisis, is forced to "get out and get under." The phrase is a terse dissertation on the proper handling of nullos.

Every beginner is duly impressed with the necessity for "getting under," but he forgets the fact that he will want to "get out" somewhat later in the hand. He "gets under" all the opening leads, both in his own hand and in dummy; he uses up all his precious low cards in the exposed hand; then, later, dummy is thrown in with an innocent-looking seven or eight. All his low cards are exhausted, he hasn't a "get-out" card left, and he takes every remaining trick.

"Getting out" is far more important than "getting under." Save get-out cards in both hands; in no-trumps you value "re-entry" cards; in nullos you must equally value "get-outry" cards. It is as important to "get out" in nullos as to "get in" in other suits; don't, I pray you, block all your means of egress.

Learn your lesson in the words of the song, and in the same order; "get out" comes first—it is the all-important issue; "get under" follows, in a secondary place. Let your text be exactly this: "Get out and get under."

Here is a hand which I saw ruined by the declarant's wild desire to "get under." He should have made five-odd nullos against strong defense; against poor defense he could have made even more. Instead, he made but two odd, (taking five tricks in all), and was badly set on a bid of five nullos, doubled; and all because he was too much afraid of taking a trick or two early in the hand.



Z is playing "five nullos," doubled, in an effort to save rubber. Dummy holds one awful suit—clubs; and Z's own hearts are very bad. But his safety lies in the fact that dummy holds a singleton heart; the moment the first lead is out and dummy goes down, the adversaries will be afraid to lead a second round of hearts for fear dummy will get a discard of the king of spades or one of the high clubs. Against adversaries who were kind enough to continue to lead hearts Z would have an easy job.

He has a perfect sequence of the low spades (up to seven) with the exception of the trey. As both adversaries cannot hold the trey, it follows that Z is safe to lose two rounds of spades.

A's first lead was correct—the eight of hearts—an intermediate card from a mixed suit, leaving low cards in the same suit for later emergencies. A had no singletons; they make the best possible nullo leads.

Dummy played the four, B the nine, (which was the same as the eight), and I think Z was correct in "playing under" with the seven. He might have taken and led another heart in order to discard a club; but that would have meant that his seven would almost certainly take a later round; with the nine and eight on the trick, and the jack-ten in his own hand, his seven comes next to the queen. I should certainly be glad of the chance to get rid of so dangerous a card as that seven without laying up a trick.

Never neglect to notice sequences. Z should play his seven-spot, leaving the trick to B. B can attack dummy's clubs or his diamonds, leading his nine-spot in the latter case, or, should he choose the clubs, leading his ace and then his six. That would be my choice.

On the ace, A would throw the king and dummy the queen; on the second round A would play the nine and dummy should positively take the trick in order to keep his clubs guarded. He should then lead the jack of diamonds, taking with his ace, and never take another trick. His good luck lies in the fact that A holds the ace of spades, and plays before dummy; if A plays that ace, dummy throws the king; if A holds the ace, dummy "plays under," and the king of spades never takes.

The same is true of hearts; if B plays his six, Z plays the three, and leaves B with the two high hearts. And if B plays high, Z can throw his jack and ten.

But see how the hand was murdered. Z ducked the first heart round (correctly;) B led the nine of diamonds, and, instead of taking with the ace, throwing the jack, and returning the suit, Z played under, in both hands. A threw the eight, as his ten and eight were equal, with the nine on the board, and as he was not anxious to lead yet his hour was coming later. B led the jack of spades, A playing the queen and taking the trick. He led the nine of clubs, dummy played under, B took with the ace and returned the six. A played king and dummy threw queen. A then led the queen of diamonds, which Z was forced to take with his ace.

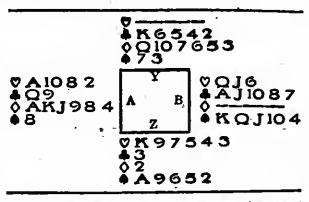
He led the three of hearts and discarded dummy's king of spades, because it was the highest card in the hand; in spite of that fact, it was not nearly as dangerous as the two clubs, because it was still guarded. A took the heart round with the ace; he led his ace of spades in order to hold the lead, and followed with the ten of diamonds. These two leads exhausted dummy's "get-out" cards. A then led his seven of clubs, which he had carefully saved for this emergency, and it landed dummy with the four remaining tricks (two clubs and two diamonds) and no possible means of escape.

As the ace of diamonds had already taken, it made five tricks in all. And Z should have taken but two. He lost 300, minus 30 aces, or 270. He should have scored 80 points, (five nullos doubled,) plus 30 aces, plus 50 for contract, plus 250 for rubber. A gain of 420 instead of a loss of 270, and a total difference of 690 points on the hand.

I have never seen a better nullo lesson; it is the commonest thing in the world to see players ruin hands in just this way and then cry, "Oh, it is impossible to make a high nullo bid!"

Don't confuse want of skill with want of opportunity. The successful handling of high nullo bids is an everyday occurrence.

The test hand of Nov. 9 was sent me with the request that I bid it "with and without high spades, and with and without nullos." The score is love-all:



If Z is using high spades he will certainly open with "five spades." That will say: "Partner, I am willing to play either hearts or royals, and hold one of the two master cards in both those suits. This is a photograph of my hand; fit it to your own."

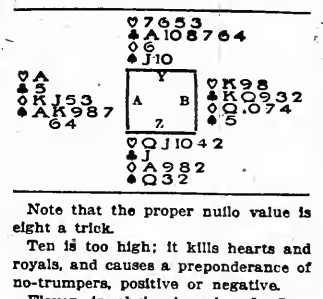
A passes the eleven-trick contract, and Y, being invited to hearts or royals, naturally chooses royals. B passes from sheer joy. He is sure of seventy-two honors and big penalties on a "two royal" bid. He might double to keep his partner from changing the bid; if he does, Z would be forced to "three hearts," and an awful time he would have of it.

With neither high spade nor nullos, Z would say "a heart"; A would force with "two diamonds," Y would pass in order to play against a desirable bid, and B would say "two royals" for his honors. Then royals would be played in their proper position.

Nullos, and nullos alone, give Z-Y an opportunity. They can bid five safe nullos, or they can bid them to a small loss rather than let A-B walk off with the booty. The hand will be forced to a pitch where it means hard work and probable defeat for any player who captures the contract.

"C. S." sends an exceptionally good solution of this hand.

Here is a wonderfully interesting hand which comes from Rancagua, Chile. It seems that THE NEW YORK TIMES, and its Auction problems, are read in that far-away spot. It is the beginning of the rubber-game, and A-B are some 300 points to the good, on the honor score:



Note that the proper nullo value is eight a trick.

Ten is too high; it kills hearts and royals, and causes a preponderance of no-trumpers, positive or negative.

Eleven is obviously absurd. Low cards should be bidable, but they certainly should not be more valuable than high ones. Don't put the bottom on top; don't use the floor for the ceiling. Eleven kills the time-honored no-trump precedence.

A suit without honors would be a ridiculous anomaly. The nullo honors are the aces, and count inversely.

These rules are the result of the longest nullo-auction practice on record.

THE GREENWOOD LAKE PHILOSOPHER

The great beauty about not having any money is that you don't have to bother about saving any of it.

You never realize that a young girl has been metamorphosed into a woman until she begins to worry about her complexion.

It's curious that hope generally requires a magnifying glass, while we can always see disappointment with the naked eye.

How can a mere man be perfect when even the sun has spots on it?

The trouble with the average man is that he seldom tries to mend his ways until he is broke.

It isn't hard to be a philosopher. All you have to do is to preach what you don't practice.

Don't lose sight of the fact that many a deliberate truth carries more malice than an innocent lie.

There is only one thing a woman loves more than being told a secret, and that is finding it out herself.

A girl may not love her enemies, but she invites them all to her wedding.

On the road to pleasure mighty few people think of buying a return ticket.

Many a man attempts to drive an automobile who couldn't drive a tack.

Those women who claim the turkey trot is little better than hugging have never been hugged.

Having dallied with experience, it isn't every man who can take the middle ground between the cynic and the fool.

No man can bluff Death into thinking he is too busy to die.

If you would always be sure of an audience, abuse somebody.

Few of our own troubles are really worth the time it takes to tell them.

The average man isn't nearly so fond of his wife as he is of his wife's husband.

Success is very often the result of a one-card draw in the game of life.

There are few disappointments in the world like that felt by the woman who has a presentment that something is going to happen when it doesn't.

A close mouth is seldom open to suspicion.

Being the under dog may have its drawbacks, but at any rate the loser is never accused of cheating.

It requires a lot of experience to be able to write a love letter that doesn't mean anything.

Don't trust the fellow who wants to borrow money for breakfast with the promise of taking you out to dinner.

The worst feature of a bad memory is that it is always springing things on us that we had fondly hoped we had forgotten.

How foolish to call the fellow who stands up with the groom at a wedding the "best man." He can't always prove it.

Half the people in the world don't know when they are licked, and the other half get used to it.

THE ROMANCE AND REALITY OF NEW YORK'S RESTAURANTS

Don't Visit Them With Too Much Money or Too Little, Don't Believe That All Labeled Foreign Isn't American, and, Above All, Beware of "Bohemian" Table d'Hotes.

ALL restaurants are good. This is the conclusion reached by the thorough student of the subject, the veteran of bills of fare, in contradistinction to the dabbler, the home-dweller who occasionally "eats out."

It is a mark of inferiority, bores tell us, to acknowledge boredom. Certainly he is a dull, unimaginative dog who can enter even the meanest restaurant without some thrill of interest. The food may be commonplace, it may be actually unpalatable, the waiters may be clumsy and inattentive, but these things should not discourage the gastronomic adventurer.

On the contrary, they should give a decided zest to his pursuit of a meal. For now he has a problem worthy of all his skill; he has before him the delicate and difficult task of so ordering that he will be served with food pleasant to the taste and satisfying to the hunger and of transforming his waiter's clumsiness and incivility into dexterity and courtesy. This can in every case be done, and the accomplishment of this feat constitutes one of the chief romantic delights of eating in restaurants.

A TIMES reporter saw an admirable instance of this in the course of a recent tour of investigation. Into a little Sixth Avenue barroom came a quietly dressed gentleman who looked well fed, but not exactly prosperous. Evidently he was, in his way, a bon vivant, a man skilled in the art of eating. Now, this barroom was the dingiest place that ever hung a "Business Man's Lunch" card in its window. Half a dozen high stools were placed before a horseshoe shaped counter, behind which two fat and surly men, whose jackets and aprons had some months before been white, were combining the functions of cook and waiter. The menu card was a slate, on which was written: "Hungarian goulash, $.15; Irish stew, $.20; pigsknuckle in jelly, $.15; roast beef, $.20; ham and potato salad, $.15; pie, $.05; coffee, $.05." Thousands of flies were buzzing about the exposed food, and the plates and knives and forks were washed by a dip in a tub of dirty water and a wipe on a filthy towel.

Not a promising place for a good meal it would seem. But the bon vivant previously mentioned was equal to the occasion. First he admiringly watched one of the surly waiters carve a ham and commented on the difficulty of the task. At once the waiter lost his surliness and asked the customer's order almost with deference. The customer ordered soft boiled eggs, a bottle of beer, and rolls.

The rolls had been handled and exposed to the dust, but he found the crumbs fresh and white. He dipped pieces of this into the eggs—he had broken off a part of the shell, and did not empty the meat of the eggs into his dubious egg-cup—and he drank his beer from the bottle.

Romance and Restaurants.

Here, for a small sum, had been purchased a refreshing and satisfying luncheon, a luncheon of food absolutely clean in surroundings from which the average person of fastidious taste would have recoiled in horror.

Of course, it may be objected that the bon vivant in question made a public show of himself by drinking out of a bottle, that beer and soft-boiled eggs are (to normal people) a sickening combination, and that a less insane meal could have been bought for the same money in a near-by dairy lunch. But the dairy lunch would not present any adventure, there would be in it no element of uncertainty, of risk to tempt the connoisseur of gustatory experience, as distinguished from the connoisseur of mere food and drink.

There are two things that interfere with the romance of eating in restaurants—the possession of too much money and the possession of too little money. The first is more serious than the second. To enjoy a visit to a restaurant one should carry just a little less money than he expects to need. He will then need to exercise more skill in ordering, and he will enjoy a delicious sense of danger as he watches the waiter add up his account.

Any consideration of the restaurants of New York City must begin with the cheapest. And the cheapest, naturally, are those where food is free. By this reference is made not to bread lines and other charitable institutions, nor to the commissariat department of jails, but to the free lunch counters.

A penniless man alone stands little chance of obtaining more than a furtive pretzel from the free lunch counter. Unless he buys a drink, he will hear the bartender's cutting repartee, "Hey, Bo! why doncha get a chair?" or "Why doncha go where you spend your money?" before he has taken the fork from its glass of red vinegar and plunged it into the tempting platter of baked beans. But two penniless men may get both pleasure and satisfaction without expense by means of the profitable diversion known as Progressive Free Lunch or Waiting for Jack.

It is advisable to start proceedings about 5 in the afternoon. At that time a fresh cooked Smithfield ham appears on the counter in saloons of the better sort, and an immaculately clad attendant takes his place, ready to serve visitors. The players should select a comparatively prosperous street, and they will find it better as a rule to confine themselves to corner saloons, as two entrances are almost imperative.

They separate at the door. The first player enters the front door and looks around expectantly. Then he frowns, mutters an oath, and looks at his watch. Then he turns to the bartender and says: "Say, did a little fellow in a brown suit, wearing a cap, come in here a while ago?" The bartender answers in the negative, and the player, looking at his watch again, strolls negligently to the lunch counter. Now the side door swings open and player No. 2 rushes in, greeting player No. 1 effusively and says: "But where's Jack? Isn't this the place he said?"

Now player No. 1 takes a sausage, or a ham sandwich, or a few biscuits as he answers, "Sure, he'll be here in a minute, I guess. Let's have a drink while we're waiting."

"No," says the second player, helping himself to lunch, "we'll wait till Jack gets here."

The bartender has overheard all this—it was intended that he should—and, looking forward to the evening which the jovial trio will spend consuming his liquid wares, he has not the slightest objection to the way in which its two present members are depleting the free lunch.

"Hey, Bill" and Goodby.

In a few minutes one player says: "Perhaps he went into the place across the street. You wait here, I'll go look." He makes a graceful exit, leaving behind him an umbrella or stick, or parcel. The other player, in a few seconds, discovers his companion's carelessness, and calls: "Hey, Bill, you forgot something!" and runs out after him, to continue the search for the mythical Jack in the nearest café.

This is perhaps the most exciting legal method of getting food known to New York. One beverage beside water can be obtained free, but the ease with which it may be procured makes its pursuit rank far below such sports as waiting for Jack. That beverage is lemonade.

Supposedly Foreign Restaurants.

"But These Things Should Not Dis_ age the Gastronomic Adventurer."

As in the large cities of Germany, there are in New York and Philadelphia restaurants run on the slot-machine principle. The customer drops two or three nickels into a slot and takes from the little cupboard which then opens a plate of food. By dropping a nickel into another slot and turning the handle of a faucet he may get a cup of tea or coffee, or a glass of milk, buttermilk, or iced tea. Customers in such restaurants take their food and drink from the slot machines to little tables holding salt, pepper, sugar, and napkins. There they sit and eat, returning to the slot machines occasionally for fresh supplies.

Now, lumps of ice and quarters of lemon cannot conveniently be served in this way. Accordingly, the management places by the iced tea faucet two metal boxes, one filled with cubes of ice, the other with neatly quartered lemons. For the adventurous luncher with an insatiable craving for lemonade to fill his glass with filtered water, which is furnished free, instead of iced tea, which costs a nickel, is a simple matter, nor is it difficult for him to temper it with the generously exposed ice, sugar, and lemon. Probably only the innocuousness of this beverage makes safe the trustfulness of the management of these slot-machine restaurants.

The amateur of restaurants cannot regard one of these automatic places without having his imagination stirred. What an opportunity for a drunken plutocrat! Think of the possibilities of a debauch in such a place! The man who spends a thousand dollars in an evening in some expensive café may think that he is enjoying life, but think of the bliss of he who comes riotously to an automatic restaurant bearing a sack of twenty thousand nickels! What joy to exhaust the supply of beef pies, to corner the farina pudding market, to break the ham sandwich bank! And never did Nero devise a more exhilarating amusement than dropping countless nickels into the liquid-refreshment slots, (and putting no glasses under the faucets,) until all the floor is a raging ocean of coffee, buttermilk, and iced tea.

Table d'Hote?—Never!

But such thoughts are dangerous for the modest adventurer. He will find amusement enough in his daily lunch hour without resorting to such Lucullan extravagance.

One thing of which the man wise in restaurant lore is seldom guilty is the consumption of table d'hote meals. There may be—there undoubtedly are—places where for a fixed sum a satisfactory meal may be procured. But who would let a restaurant keeper, or any one else, dictate to him what he shall eat? Shall he give up all the delight of choosing the elements that shall complement each other and result in a meal harmonious and complete? Shall he give up his sacred right of free will? No, however excellent the viands may be that compose a table d'hôte meal, they cannot bring to the diner a tenth of the pleasure which those he himself has selected will give him.

Particularly is this true in regard to restaurants supposedly foreign in their cuisine. Young gentlemen fresh from Harvard, who have what they call the social consciousness, and wear New Thought jewelry, are able to extract a simple pleasure from the deliberately bohemian table d'hôte. They enjoy the large bottle of acidulous red wine, the world-weary spaghetti—even the meat, elastic in spite of its years. They enjoy (they state) the atmosphere of the place.

Certainly all this is as it should be. THE TIMES reporter to whom this investigation was intrusted was deeply gratified by one exhibition of receptivity. He dined in an Italian table d'hôte, his companions being young men and women who said that they liked a Picabia canvas because one could live with it without wearying. They were very wise, very sophisticated.

After the close of four courses of quite impossible food, the head waiter announced that souvenirs were to be distributed. He then went from table to table solemnly presenting each guest with a very small red slipper made of tin. When the tongue of the slipper was pressed down it clicked loudly.

Did the Futurists, Cubists, ultra-intense artists, reject the gifts? No! They took them with delight, and all through the evening they clicked them, in a manner indicative of esoteric bohemianism.

It is pleasant to witness these manifestations of appealing simplicity, and it must be admitted that they are numerous in the French and Italian table d'hôtes. There may be seen not only the serious-minded young makers of verses and pictures, but those entertaining phenomena, the dissipating school teachers. From every little town in the Middle West they come, making New York their place for holiday. In parties of three or four they timidly enter little restaurants with foreign names; timidly, but with a certain delicate bravado. A sip of Chianti is an adventure, the fork that lifts spaghetti trembles with excitement. Well, considering the quality of the spaghetti, the fork should tremble.

But the prosaic person who prefers good food and drink to romantic atmosphere usually avoids foreign table d'hôtes. Not that he disdains French and Italian cooking! He is, it may be supposed, sane. But he likes to go where he may taste food cooked as on the Piedmontese farm or in a Neapolitan hotel, to drink wine that knows other skies than those of California.

The Real, Real Thing.

So he goes to a place on Chambers Street and eats lamb, cooked to delicious tenderness on steel skewers; drinks arrack and thick, spicy coffee, and inhales the fragrant smoke of a narghile. Or, better yet, he goes to a place that stands in the shadow of the Elevated, a stone's throw from the Church of Santa Maria del Pompeii.

There is a restaurant worthy of Lucullus, his patron! THE TIMES reporter refrains from giving its name, for he would not rob all other restaurants of their custom. There the word table d'hôte is unknown, and every guest is an artist in his appreciation of food.

There may be consumed bottles of mellow Barbera, and in Winter great glasses of that glorified egg-nogg, the name of which is (the reporter advances this spelling with diffidence) zablone. There may be consumed salads of crisp green dandelion and lettuce, decorated with the white and golden disks of hard-boiled eggs. Fish—given a strange charm by means of spices and oils known to the epicures of ancient Rome—chops, simple, genuine chops transformed into delicacies dangerously luscious—these are to be had at, well, not far from the Church of Santa Maria del Pompeii. And all for a sum ridiculously small.

And there may also be procured a dish known as—what was it known as? It was brown, and there was a glory of onions about it. Well, the reporter must at once go back and find out.

"Two Things Interfere With the Enjoyment of Food, Too Much Money and Too Little."

LITTLE STORIES OF FACT AND FANCY

Telephone Numbers.

ALL the head clerk had to say in reply to the caller's first question was, "Lots of 'em." "Do you have many requests for a change in telephone numbers?" had been question No. 1. The reply to the second question required elaboration.

"What are some of the reasons advanced for desiring a change?" was question No. 2.

"Oh," sighed the clerk, "they are manifold. Some folks don't like their numbers because they are hard to remember. In direct contrast to this class of grumblers was the man who came in here to complain an hour or so ago. His trouble was that his number was too handy.

"'It is too easily remembered,' he said. 'It is 1,000, and everybody can remember it. I live in a big apartment house where, in addition to the office telephone, most of the families have wires of their own. But they don't need 'em.

"'Whenever anybody wants to send them a message he calls up and asks us to deliver it. Whenever the other folks in our block tell their friends or relations to telephone them on any matter of business or social entertainment they first mention their own number in a casual way, and then they add: "But I know you can't remember it, and you needn't bother to look it up in the directory. Just call up Mr. Wilkinson and he will see that we get the message. His number is 1,000. You can remember that all right." And they do, too.'

"That," continued the head clerk, "was an unusual case. I sympathized with the overworked subscriber and promised to report his complaint to the committee first thing in the morning.

"Another thing that lies at the root of many requests for change is the superstition of our subscribers. Thirteen is not the only number that is in illrepute. There are many persons who have one certain number which, for individual reasons, they believe invariably brings them bad luck, and if by chance that number is allotted to them by the telephone company they are never satisfied until it is changed to something which, so far as they are concerned, has no taint of hoodoo.

"A good many complaints reach us from people whose number is the same as that of some prominent concern in another exchange, whose messages they frequently receive by mistake.

"Last month we made a change for a well-to-do chap who had two telephones—one at his office and one at his residence. They were both the same number, only in different exchanges, and the poor fellow was kept in hot water half the time by the mixing of calls. Twe-thirds of the private, confidential communications that should have come to the office during business hours went to his house, and the man was growing gray from worry."

The Proof.

Stanley, aged 5, wanted to know if vermicelli was alive when he saw it curl about in hot water, and did not seem quite convinced when told that it was not. A few days later, on seeing his mother preparing marcaroni for dinner, he exclaimed triumphantly: "Now I know vermicelli is alive, else how could it grow into marcaroni?"

A Rude Shock.

AMERICANS traveling abroad soon find out that the language they speak is not looked upon always as genuine English, either by the haughty Englishman or the natives of the continent of Europe. One already aware of this view, who thought he was hardened to it, got the rudest shock of all last Summer.

In a Paris book store window he saw several little red books.

"How to Learn German," was the title of one of them. Another was called "How to Learn Spanish," another "How to Learn Italian," and so on.

The American was looking at them with an uninterested air when his expression suddenly changed to one of utter amazement. Casting his eye on still another of the little red books he read on its cover:

"How to Learn American!"

Plastering Gloves.

GLOVES had been the saleswoman's specialty for so many years that she thought she knew everything about them there was to be known. But she found out there were a few things yet to learn when the woman who had bought three pairs of street gloves asked her to send them up to the workroom and have strips of adhesive plaster pasted on the inside of each seam.

"What for?" the saleswoman asked.

"Because they will wear so much better. I have been finishing off my gloves that way for the last five years and they wear twice as well as other people's gloves. You can probably make a neater job of it than I can, so I'd like it done before the gloves are sent home."

How It Happened.

HIS wife had made a little quiet investigation of his coat.

"Henry," she said in no pleasant tone, "you never mailed the letter I gave you last week. I can feel it right in the corner of your coat."

Her husband brought out the coat in a rather shame-faced way. There was no doubt, the letter was just were she said. Reaching into the inside pocket, he groped down and down until he at last grasped the envelope.

"Yes, my dear," he replied; "you see, it slipped down through the torn lining you promised to sew up more than a month ago."

Must Restrain His Grief.

A PECULIARITY of bridegrooms was pointed out by the curate, who asked asthmatically for a medical certificate showing that he had a cold in the head.

"But that is self-evident," said the doctor. "You don't need a doctor's word for that. You are all choked up and your eyes are watery."

"It is those very symptoms that make a certificate necessary to placate the bridegroom," said the curate. "Without that, he will think I am crying, and will take my tears as a personal insult. Copious weeping is the privilege of everybody at a wedding except the parson.

"Bridesmaids may sniffle, mothers sob, and bride and bridegroom falter, but the man who ties the knot must remain dry-eyed and clear-voiced. Emotion on his part is construed as grief over the bride's bad bargain, and the best-natured bridegroom on earth resents it."

His Money's Worth.

ALTHOUGH only a month married the young man had learned much feminine logic. Tired out with a day in the shops, his wife opened her eyes languidly as he struck a match.

"Another?" she said. "Mortimer, I do wish you would not use cigarettes."

"Why?"

"Because they are bad for you. You don't know what is in them."

"Oh, yes, I do. Why, for the trifling sum that cigarette costs you get nicotine, valerian, possibly a little morphine, and any quantity of carbon."

She sat up, alert and bright eyed.

"Good gracious!" she said. "All that? Why that is a real bargain, isn't it?"

BOLD EXPLORER FINDS NEW LAND IN SIBERIAN OCEAN

Lieut. Wilkitzky of Russian Navy Discovers and Names Nicholas II. Land, a Large Area, Probably of Volcanic Formation, Abounding in Arctic Game.

By Major General A. W. Greely, U. S. A.

IT has often recurred in polar exploration, as in many other phases of human activity, that the so-called last word is not the final one. When the remarkable series of arctic expeditions came to an end, after years of fruitless search for the long-lost Sir John Franklin, a fleet commander Sir Edward Belcher wrote "The Last of the Arctic Voyages."

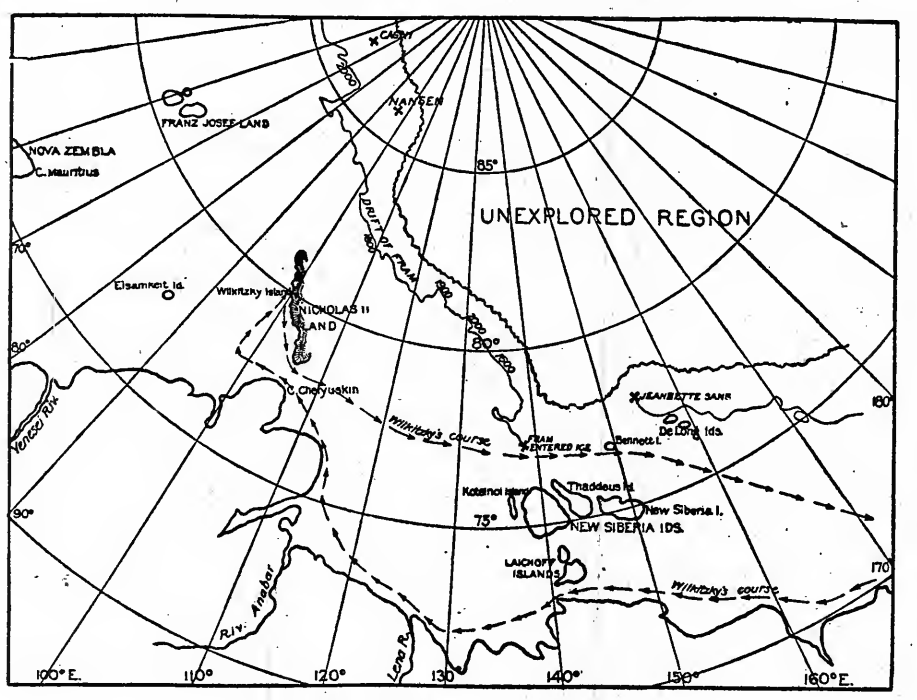
No one was more surprised than Belcher when McClintock's search in the Fox was initiated and the final record was made of Franklin's death and of the discoveries of his shipmates. And then followed that line of heroic American explorations which opened up the wondrous waterways of the West Greenland coast, and thus unbarred the hitherto closed gates to the very pole.

In years just passed, when the stirring dispatch came announcing that Peary had reached the north geographic pole, the acme of his ambitious struggles of a quarter of a century, the word went round that arctic exploration was at an end.

Even that virile and indomitable descendant of the Norse Vikings, Roald Amundsen, was deterred from that arctic voyage on which he had already started. Turning the prow of the Fram from Bering Strait, he sailed southward and, scaling high antarctic peaks with Norwegian ski and dog-drawn sledges, attained the south geographic pole.

Much Activity in 1912.

When the year 1912 opened there was noted a widespread recurrence of popular interest in arctic fields of research, so that there were no less than six expeditions initiated, excluding those of Russia. The Dane, Koch, and the Swiss, de Quervain, crossed the Greenland ice-cap at different points. The German, Schröder-Strauz, found disaster and death in North Spitzbergen. Meanwhile the Canadian, Stefansson, planned to reach the hypothetical continent long forecast by Americans. The American, McMillan, sought definitely to outline Crocker Land. The Frenchman, Payer, re-explored that Franz Josef Land which his father was first to traverse. Amundsen now starts via Bering Strait to drift northwestward with the ice-floes of the Siberian ocean. These all represent what may be called foreign and idealistic exploration, as compared with the Russian expeditions, which are domestic and economic.



Nicholas II. Land and the Siberian Ocean.
(Soundings in Fathoms.)

Before describing the discoveries of Lieut. Wilkitzky, the Russian, it will be well to set forth foreign invasions into the Siberian Ocean nearest to Nicholas Second Land. First in order is the expedition of 1880, commanded by De Long, which drifted northwesterly from Bering Strait until the Jeannette was crushed by the ice. It found through its soundings that the continental shelf of Siberia extended some three hundred miles into the ocean, which was dotted with islets. The most westerly of the De Long islands, Bennett Island, proves to be on the same parallel with and about five hundred miles to the east of Nicholas Second Land.

Nansen followed in the Fram, adopting De Long's plan. The drift of the Fram was a practical continuation of that of the Jeannette, though no land was seen and the ship passed into deep water about 250 miles to the north of the New Siberian Islands. In general the course of the Fram was roughly parallel with the Siberian coast line, and she passed Cape Chelyuskin in 1894, 300 miles to the north.

The most important addition to the hydrography of the Siberian Ocean, time and means considered, was made by Capt. Edward H. Johannesen, in the sailing schooner Nordland. Leaving Cape Mauritius, Nova Zembla, he found the ocean ice-free, so that he crossed to Cape Taimur, near Cape Chelyuskin. On Aug. 16, 1878, he discovered in 77 degrees 42 minutes north latitude, 86 degrees east longitude, an island named Elsamkeit (Lonely Island), scarcely more than 100 miles to the west of Nicholas Second Land.

Elsamkeit proved to be ice-free, quite high land, with scant vegetation. Driftwood was most abundant along the coast. This remote spot was, however, a refuge for arctic life—birds and mammals. More sea animals were here seen than had been earlier noted in the voyage along the shores of Nova Zembla and of Spitzbergen. While circumnavigating the island Johannesen observed dovekies, arctic tern, the glacious gull, the fulmar, and various other birds, three polar bears, some walruses, and many seals. Johannesen's soundings disclosed a shallow sea, so that the continental bench extended here at least 150 miles into the ocean.

Most interesting were the experiences of Baron A. E. von Nordenskjöld, the greatest, all phases of action and of knowledge considered, of arctic explorers. In his unique voyage, the circumnavigation of Asia, he reached on Aug. 19, 1878, the north point of Asia, Cape Chelyuskin, which he determined to be in 77 degrees 36 minutes north latitude 103 degrees 17 minutes east longitude. As he was the first known visitor to the cape since its discovery by Chelyuskin by sledge journey in 1742, its surroundings were carefully noted.

Nordenskjöld sent his supporting steamer, the Lena, seaward to dredge. She was stopped by heavy and very close ice in about 77 degrees 45 minutes north, some seventy-five miles south of Nicholas Second Land, to which she made the nearest approach hitherto on record. Of the sea life he records:

It was the most abundant yield that the trawl net brought up at any one time during the whole of our voyage around the coast of Asia, and this from the sea off the northern extremity of that continent.

As bearing on the presence and migration of birds, he adds:

There were seen a large number of sandpipers, an exceedingly numerous flock of barnacle geese—evidently migrating to more southerly regions, perhaps from some polar land lying to the north of Cape Chelyuskin—a loon, some kittiwakes and ivory gulls, and remains of owls.

The desolation and barrenness of the surrounding land made notable the presence of these birds.

The discovery of Nicholas Second Land is simply an incident in the economic development of the Russian Empire. The general public is unaware of the astounding extent and the enormous potential resources of arctic Russia. Its area extends half way around the world—through 168 degrees of longitude—while the distance across it exceeds by many hundred miles that from the northernmost point of North America to the Isthmus of Panama.

Biggest of All Surveys.

The survey of these remote regions was but one of the many progressive improvements for Russia initiated by that luminous character, Peter the Great. Planned in his last years, this most extended of geographic surveys ever attempted was known as the Great Northern Expedition; it lasted seventeen years, from 1725 to 1742. Its results gave fame to Bering, to Muravief, to the Laptiefs, to Prontschischef, and others. In later days they were followed by Kotzebue, Wrangel, Anjou, and Sannikof.

How Russia has persistently pursued a maritime policy for the development of Siberian trade has been fully set forth by Gen. J. de Schokalsky, Russian Imperial Navy, in various publications. Safe routes of navigation to and from the valleys of the Yenesei, of the Lena, and of other lesser rivers, are absolutely essential for the prosperity and development of this habitable empire, which is half as large again as is the United States. Siberia is no longer a country of convicts, but a land swarming with pioneers, a wondrous leaven among its ten millions of inhabitants.

Maritime surveys for practicable sea routes have been prosecuted in the most thorough manner, and with creditable persistence. Strong stanch ships have been constructed, equipped with the best ice-breaking appliances, fitted for navigating the heavy and dangerous ice-floes of Kara Sea and of the Siberian Ocean.

Routes via the Kara Sea and around the north end of Nova Zembla have been tested, but neither has been found safe for commercial ships year after year. It was then suggested that a satisfactory route could be found by entering Bering Strait. This would enable Russia to obtain a Siberian outlet, with Vladivostok as the main port, to which could be shipped the products of the vast region to the east of Cape Chelyuskin.

In the Summer of 1912 two powerful ice-breakers, the Taimyr and the Vaigatz, made safely a voyage via Bering Strait to and from the Lena. Soundings and surveys were made en route, but ice conditions around Cape Chelyuskin prevented the ships from returning to Russia through the Kara Sea.

Early in July, 1913, the ice-breakers Vaigatz and Taimyr left Vladivostok to prosecute their surveys, and to renew their efforts to round Cape Chelyuskin and return to St. Petersburg through the Kara Sea.

The expedition was under command of Gen. Sergeief, Imperial Russian Navy, who was incapacitated by a stroke of apoplexy. Lieut. Wilkitzky, Imperial Navy, succeeding to the command, made a running survey of the Asiatic Coast from the Kolyma River, latitude 70 degrees north, longitude 160 degrees east, to Cape Chelyuskin. It is the first time that this cape has been visited by a ship coming from the eastward. Wilkitzky's hopes of completing the circumnavigation of Asia were destroyed in longitude 96 degrees east, where he found an impenetrable barrier of solid ice.

As the sea was open to the north he decided to explore this unknown area of the Siberian Ocean. To his astonishment he soon sighted high peaks, the summits of a new land. In latitude 81 degrees north, longitude 100 degrees east, he landed, hoisted the Russian imperial colors, took possession of the land in the name of the Czar, and named it Nicholas Second Land.

Wilkitzky followed the land northward, finding it with a continuing northwesterly trend. In latitude 81 degrees north, longitude 96 degrees east, he found a pack of solid ice which forbade further progress, though the land reached as far as eye could see. Retracing his course, the southern extremity of the new land was found in latitude 79 degrees north, longitude 104 degrees east, whence the coast took a trend to the northeast. The land is thus known to extend through more than two degrees of latitude, with a coastline of nearly 200 miles.

While data to that effect are lacking, it is probable that Nicholas Second Land consists of a number of close-lying islands, similar to Franz Josef Land. Its high, abrupt cliffs, and many isolated peaks, seem to sustain Wilkitzky's opinion that it may be of volcanic formation. Despite the fact that vegetation was scant at the landing place, the land evidently abounds in arctic game. Traces of reindeer were visible, polar bears were seen, and bird life was abundant. Off shore many walrus were seen. The large collection made by the Russian officers of specimens relating to the geology, the fauna and the flora will throw much light on its physical conditions.

The existence of Nicholas Second Land has the effect of extending to the northeast the area of Kara Sea from 250 to 300 miles. With its shifting fields of ice thus bounded and restricted, a northern route to Siberia is shown to be impracticable, and the along-shore route is indicated as the only promising one.

Asia's Added Width.

In the way of general knowledge it is evident that the continental shelf of Asia is broader than has been generally supposed, being from 300 to 350 miles or more in width.

When forced from the southern shores of Nicholas Second Land by the ice pack, Wilkitzky found the ocean to the east quite ice-free. He steamed easily along the 79th parallel through the sea where De Long and his gallant companions drifted for months, ice-beset until the Jeannette sank.

Some additions and corrections were made in the number and position of the De Long Islands. Most important was the discovery by Wilkitzky on Bennett Island of the diaries and records of Baron Toll. This Russian explorer visited this island by sledge in 1902 and doubtless perished on his attempted return journey to Kotelnoi Island. The scientific world will await with interest the last message of this intrepid Russian scientist, who gave his life to advance geographic knowledge of Russian dominions. It is a happy coincidence that this very year a memorial tablet to Baron Toll is in process of installment on Kotelnoi Island.

STAGING ELABORATE PAGEANT IN HONOR OF CALIFORNIA'S HERO-PRIEST

Theatre Built for "The Mission Play," Celebrating the 200th Anniversary of the Birth of Father Serra, the Pioneer Missionary Who Converted the Indians of the Coast.

TO-MORROW is the 200th anniversary of the birthday of Father Junipero Serra. He was the Franciscan priest who founded the California missions and converted the Indians of the California Coast from San Diego to San Francisco during practically the same period that the Revolutionary War was being fought on this side of the continent.

The work of Father Junipero and other Franciscan missionaries in civilizing the Indians on the mainland of Mexico, the Gulf of California, and what is now the State of California, is one of the finest pages of Spanish history. Father Junipero's part was played chiefly on what is now American soil. His monuments are the twenty-one missions which dot the Pacific Coast with picturesque ruins from the Mexican border as far north as San Francisco Bay.

It is only recently that California has discovered that it has a hero of the true cast in Father Junipero. Before California became American soil, in 1848, Mexico had gained its independence from Spain, and Mexican politicians and land-grabbers had confiscated the mission property and put an end to the career of the Franciscans in California.

The missions were already on their way to decay when the discovery of gold in the Sierra Nevada Mountains started the flow of population away from the southern coast and into the mining regions. San Francisco became the great city of the State. The mission communities, which had been the centres of civilization in California for half a century, were for the most part deserted. The only remains of several of the Franciscan towns of early California are the dilapidated mission churches.

The missions remained almost forgotten up to the last few decades, when artists began to discover that many of the old mission churches were most artistic ruins. Patriotic Californians started a crusade to save them from becoming heaps of stones, and the Franciscan remains are now being carefully preserved.

Recently, too, Californians have become aware that they have a romantic story in the life of the priest and his followers, whose peaceful conquest of the Indians of the Southern California Coast made such a striking contrast with the Indian wars and Indian massacres that attended the settling of Eastern States. There was plenty of Indian fighting in the interior and northern parts of California, but the territory under the influence of the Franciscans was settled without bloodshed.

Californians are celebrating the anniversary of Father Junipero's birth by producing "The Mission Play," which enthusiastic native sons describe as "The Oberammergau of California." A theatre has been built near the San Gabriel Mission, founded in 1771 by Father Junipero, for the staging of this pageant play which tells pictorially of the rise of the mission civilization from the time that the padres began their first settlement at San Diego.

The playhouse is erected on the ground where the Indian neophytes, under the direction of the padres, shaped the brick and stone with which the San Gabriel Mission was built. Most of the costumes and stage properties are relics of mission days. All of the 800 players in the historic drama are Californians by birth.

The theatre is built inside a stockade like those which inclosed the mission buildings. The promenade around the theatre represents El Camino Real, (the King's Highway,) the road which ran along the coast and connected all the missions from San Diego to San Francisco. Each of the missions was built at a distance of one day's walk from its nearest neighbors, so that soldiers or travelers on foot could always find shelter at the end of a day's journey. At intervals along the promenade are replicas of the missions, with tiled roofs like the original, with the plastered walls, the patios, arches, towers, belfries, and bells. Each of these tiny reproductions is set in its place in a raised map of the country in which the original mission stands.

In the interior of the theatre the rude craftsmanship of the Indian builders is imitated in the rough timbering, the windows with little panes of colored glass, and the walls hung with skins and paintings by Indians and padres.

The theatre was decorated by Henry Kabierske. The author of the pageant play is John Steven McGroarty, a poet and historian of California. Father Serra is the central figure, and the 800 others in the cast are the Californians of his day, the padres, Spanish soldiers, and Indians.

Father Serra was born on Nov. 14, 1713, at Petra, on the island of Minorca. He was educated at the Lullian University at Palma, where he occupied the Duns Scotus Chair of Philosophy until he went to Mexico to join the missionary college at San Fernando. His first mission was with the Sierra Gorda Indians, where he served for nine years.

His fame as a missionary preacher and his success among the Indians of Mexico resulted in his selection to lead the band of Franciscan padres into California. He found it hard to make an impression on the dull imagination of the Indians, and his efforts to put his ideas into such shape that the Indian mind could grasp them led him to the use of extraordinary methods in the pulpit. It is recorded that, to illustrate the doctrine of penance, he would pound his breast with a stone, scourge himself, and even apply lighted torches to his bare breast.

The order for the invasion of California by the Franciscan friars came from the Spanish Crown. The Russians had often visited that territory with the view, it was believed, of taking possession. A military expedition under Don Gaspar Portola was organized in Mexico to explore and secure the entire Pacific Coast as far northwest as it had been explored. The policy of sending priests along with such expeditions to spread the Catholic religion among the natives had been founded by Isabella with the voyage of Columbus and lasted until Spain's power in the New World was completely crushed.

Father Serra and his missionaries, accompanied by the soldiers under Portola, made their expedition from Lower to Upper California on foot in 1769, arriving at San Diego in May of that year. Portola continued northward, intending to reach Monterey, where a Spanish military station had been established.

The padres found the Indians about San Diego more difficult to deal with than the Mexican Indians had been. They stubbornly refused to be preached to and at first shot arrows at the missionaries who came out to convert them. Kindness, persuasiveness, and even gifts of pretty things that seldom lacked weight with Indians failed to make a single convert during the first year. The historian Bancroft says that "in all the missionary annals of the Northwest there is no other instance where paganism remained stubborn so long."

Fray Junipero Serra.
(From "California and Its Missions." Copyright by Bryan J. Clinch).

The first act of the mission play represents the padres at this period, cast down by their failure to make progress with the Indians and anxious about their own means of living, because of the failure of a Spanish ship which was to arrive with provisions shortly after their settlement at San Diego.

The scenery at the back of the stage pictures San Diego Bay, "the Harbor of the Sun," with the purple promontory of Point Loma on the right, and moored in the bay the quaint Spanish ship San Carlos, which brought part of the expedition to San Diego. In the foreground are tule huts, the first shelter of the little company.

While Father Junipero is praying, and others are talking of the discouraging prospect, Catalonian soldiers, who remained at the mission, rush in with the news that they have sighted Portola and his men. The Spanish soldier enters with his cavalcade of wounded, half-starved, exhausted followers. They have failed to find the fort at Monterey, and are almost thrown into despair when they hear that the promised ship has not arrived. Portola is for returning to Mexico and will not listen to Father Junipero's pleas to remain. Portola is unmoved by Junipero's impressive declaration that "if we abandon California, God will abandon us." Portola is about to leave the padres and start back with his soldiers, when a sail is sighted and a Spanish galleon rounds Point Loma and glides toward them on moonlit water.

C. Stuart Madden writes:

The beginning of the second act is announced by the oldest mission bell in California, suspended from the ceiling. The curtain disappears and we are confronted by the patio of the beautiful Mission of San Carlos at Carmel, near Monterey. This was the civil and military, as well as religious, headquarters of all the missions, and the home of Junipero, the Father President. The calm waters of Carmel Bay are visible beyond the series of mission arches in the rear. At the right is the chapel, and at one side of the patio a large pepper tree. Near the chapel stands a wooden cross.

In the patio are the same Catalonian soldiers whom we previously saw, but they look much older, and we glean from their conversation that it is fifteen years since their painful experiences in California. We also derive the information that this is to be a great day at San Carlos, for the Superiors of all nine missions now established are here to make a report of their progress to the Father President.

The padres gather about their President, now grown very old and white, to report the results of their efforts in the nine missions. They tell of thousands of converted Indians, all well clothed, able to speak and write Spanish, singing the music of the mass. Several stone churches have been built by them; the San Gabriel Indians have built and launched a ship; the San Luis Obispo Indians have become proficient in making curved tile for roofing.

Father Junipero speaks very touchingly of his great love for California from San Diego, where the first palm and olive trees were planted and "the roses are so like the roses of Castile" to the boundary on the north, the grandest harbor in the world.

The dramatic passage in this act follows the arrival of Captain Rivera, Commandante of the King's soldiers in California. Rivera, resplendent in a scarlet cloak and a gold-trimmed velvet suit, is in brilliant pictorial contrast to the brown-robed, sandaled padres. The soldier demands a beautiful half-breed girl who belongs to the mission. Father Serra will not hear of his request. When Rivera becomes threatening, Father Serra assures him that "were he ten times the Commandante, he would not fear him or yield to him," and, like the great Cardinal in the famous scene from "Richelieu," eloquently threatens him with the curse of Rome should he touch the girl. Rivera cringes in fear of the menacing curse, and withdraws defeated.

Father Junipero died at Monterey on Aug. 28, 1784, and in the third act is an entire change, as forty years have passed since the ending of the second act, and we are brought nearly to modern times. The mission glory is gone. The scene is the patio of San Juan Capistrano, strewn with straw and used for a stable by the Americans who have bought it. The once beautiful edifice is in decay, and the Indians, to whom it rightfully belongs, have been driven to the hills.

A señora who has known the missions in the days of their prosperity visits the sacred ground. She tells of the freedom of Mexico from Spain and of the age that followed—the rich Indian lands seized by the Government and sold to eager Americanos. She relates to the aged Spanish guard who baptized Junipero how the other mission lands have been sold. After a touching farewell to the old mission, with its wrecked hopes, the señora takes her leave, and the curtain closes.

FIVE POEMS BY T. A. DALY

DA FARMER.

I don'ta care eef all dees town
Turn upsi' down,
An' earth-quake com' along som' day
An' bust eet up. I gonna 'way;
I won't be dere!
At last I gone turn my face
From evratheeng een deesa place.
I don'ta care.

I don'ta care for town nohow;
I'm farmer now!
I gotta house dat stan's alone,
Three leetla rooms—but all my own—
Wan bed, two chair,
Wan stove, two table an' wan wife.
So for dees town, you bat my life,
I don'ta care!

I don'ta care for ceety street;
Eet smals not sweet.
But now I know how mooch eet's worth
To own som' leetle cleana earth,
To own som' air
Dat's sweet as wine upon da breath—
Here even eef I starve to death,
I don'ta care!

Little Polly's Pome.

THANKSGIVING.

THIS is the day the President
Has set aside for merriment
And games if they are innocent
And do not harm or hurt you
Yet all good people everywhere
A little of this day should spare
To go to church and say a prayer
Which is the highest virtue.

For everybody we should pray
And some kind words we ought to say
For Black Sheep that have gone astray
And every hardened sinner
And after that when church is out
It will be time enough no doubt
To play a while and think about
Our appetite for dinner.

Your dinner will be very good
If you have turkey for your food
Though some folks in your neighborhood
The earn the barest living
And have no cash and cant get trust
May have to dine upon a crust
But even so such people must Have reason for Thanksgiving.

INSCRIPTION FOR A FIREPLACE.

I'm Home's heart! Warmth I give and light,
If you but feed me.
I blossom in the Winter night,
When most you need me.

To melt your cares, to warm your guest
My cheer's supplied you;
But, O! to know me at my best,
Hold Her beside you!

TO A RICH MAN.

WHAT worries me and makes me blue
May seem a little thing to you;
But then, you see, you have a lot
Of ready cash, and I have not.
Your bills are paid, but mine are due.
You say you have your troubles, too;
A jaded heart, a jaundiced view
Of life? Thank Heaven, that is not
What worries me!

My heart trips light; my wife's beats true;
We pluck life's roses, not its rue.
And so when next you ask me what
My worries are, what cares I've got,
I'll answer you with courage new:
"What? Worries? Me?"

DA LEETLA DOCTOR.

"W'EN I am beeg," says he—
Dat leetla keed of mine—
"Gran' doctor I weell be,
An' O! so smart an' fine
You weell be proud of me;
W'en I am beeg," says he.

"You beeg enough," she say—
Hees madre; dat's my wife—
"I like you deesa way;
Eef only all your life
Like deesa you could stay!
You beeg enough," she say.

"You are too beeg!" I cry.
"You crowd your madre's heart.
Eef you grow more, O! my!
You bust eet all apart!
No room dere now have I;
You are too beeg!" I cry.

"W'en I am beeg," says he,
"I feex all dat for you.
Eef hearts can bust, you see,
Dey can be mends, too!
Gran' doctor I weell be
W'en I am beeg," says he.

A Carload of Prehistoric Remains Just Received by the American Museum of Natural History from Southern Alberta, Where Its Scientific Scouts Have Been Exploring.

THE American Museum of Natural History has just received a carload of fossils, a collection made during the past Summer by the expedition exploring for cretaceous dinosaurs in Southern Alberta, Canada. Since 1909 expeditions have gone to Alberta each season to search for these remains, and the results have been exceptional in the number of specimens secured, their state of preservation, and in the variety of forms represented, so that to-day the American Museum is unrivaled in its collection of skulls and skeletons of cretaceous dinosaurs.

Just north of the Canadian boundary line, in the south central part of Alberta, is a vast area of level land dotted here and there by small lakes, and until recently covered by luxuriant grass. A few years ago it was found that the soil would produce enormous yields of small grain, and since then settlement has been so rapid that now very little homestead land remains unoccupied, except remote from railroads.

These fertile prairies are drained by many small rivers, which unite to form the Saskatchewan. One of its chief tributaries is the Red Deer River, rising in the snow-clad Rockies just north of Banff. Uniting with other lesser streams in the foothills it forms an irresistible force which has cut through the soft sediments of the level prairie land and formed a miniature Grand Cañon, a mile wide at the top and three to five hundred feet deep.

Great Aid to Science.

In places the walls are nearly vertical and the river winds in its narrow valley below, touching first one side, then the other, but ever cutting and disclosing to view treasures of prehistoric life—fossil bones, shells and leaves. By the study of these remains it is possible for scientists to determine the relation of the various animals, to reconstruct their skeletons and probable appearance in life, and to repicture the conditions under which they existed in those remote periods.

Species of the same genus are frequently different above or below a given position and the rocks that entomb them may show a different origin or form of deposition, so for convenience the rocks are classified and given formation names, often taken from the type locality where first recognized.

Traveling down the Red Deer River four distinct geological formations may be recognized, overlapping like shingles on a roof, each containing characteristic fossils. Were the cañon deeper near the mountains these divisions would show one on top of another. As it is, a journey of three hundred miles down the river is necessary in order to see a full section of the different formations. During such a trip one travels successively through fresh water, brackish water, and marine sediments all filled with animal remains.

Usually fossil remains are found in "bad lands," or areas denuded of vegetation, but in this instance they are found in the face of the cañon walls and in the eroded surfaces of the river valley. As there are no roads down the river valley the most feasible way to carry on explorations is from a boat. Consequently the museum expedition constructed a flat boat, large enough to accommodate a cook tent as well as to carry several tons of weight, provisions and materials for collecting fossils.

High up on the prairie, buildings and haystacks proclaim a well settled country, but in the upper course of the river habitations are rarely seen from the water and the expedition would float for hours through picturesque solitude, unbroken save by the noise of the rapids. Frequently the boat would be tied up while layer by layer the cliffs were searched for fossils.

Broken fragments of bone washed down the hillsides are traced up to where the remaining parts protrude from the bank; all broken pieces are carefully collected, and when the remaining bones are uncovered they are hardened with shellac. If the specimen is any considerable part of a skeleton it is next determined where to break it with the least damage, and the various sections are taken up in plaster of Paris reinforced with burlap. Then they are turned over and covered with plaster on the under side to form a complete block. The various sections are then numbered, and a strong box is made for each large block, which is packed carefully in hay to insure its safe journey to the museum.

Thus mile after mile the river banks are searched carefully and at the close of each season the boats are beached for the Winter and the collection sent back to the museum laboratories to be prepared for exhibition and study.

In the lower reaches of the river only sea shells are found in the rocks, showing that the ocean once covered this area through a long period of time during which several hundred feet of strata accumulated. Where these rocks flank the mountains they are tilted at an angle of several degrees, which shows they were laid down before the elevation of the Rocky Mountains. This formation is named the Pierre.

Near the close of the Pierre a part of the inland sea floor was elevated and became a land mass of low altitude. In the fresh, and partly salt or brackish water, lake and river beds of this period, known as the Belly River formation, are preserved leaf impressions of a variety of trees, teeth and fragmentary bones of mammals, and numerous remains of a great variety of turtles, crocodiles, and dinosaurs.

Strata of sea shells frequently occur above and below fresh water shells, and presumably this area was near sea-level and subject to frequent invasions of the sea, a condition that may be better understood by comparison with the present Everglades of Florida. Impressions of palms, figs, and other subtropical plants are mingled with those of temperate zones, but the general flora must have been that of a warm temperate climate—a striking contrast to the cold climate of to-day.

In those swampy glades of prehistoric days dwelt a host of reptiles, large and small and of various forms, flesh-eaters and herb-eaters, but all sharing certain characteristics in common and known as dinosaurs. They were the dominant creatures of the day, for the warm-blooded mammals were as yet small, the largest so far known not exceeding the size of a house cat. The dinosaurs were not closely related to any living reptile, but they share some characters in common with lizards and crocodiles. Some, if not all kinds, laid eggs, but the very young are rarely found.

One of the most abundant of these remarkable reptiles is the trachodon, a creature well known to museum visitors. It was an herb-eater of large size, reaching a maximum of thirty-five feet in length and seventeen feet in height. It was kangaroo-shaped, having long hind legs on which it walked chiefly, and shorter front legs with feet probably webbed. The body was covered with scales like some of the modern lizards, but they were not overlapping. The head resembled that of a duck with a broad duck-like bill covered by a horny sheath—hence the name "Duck-billed Dinosaur." Probably the most striking feature about this creature is its teeth, of which there are more than two thousand in each individual.

Among living saurians the small South American iguana amblyrhynchus may best be compared with the trachodons, notwithstanding their difference in size; their feeding habits were probably similar. Having no means of defense they lived in the water, where they were free from the attacks of the flesh-eaters. It is evident that great numbers lived in the prehistoric marshes, for there are numerous quarries along the Red Deer River in which there are hundreds of bones of these creatures.

The skeleton of a new genus closely related to the trachodon was recently put on exhibition in the Dinosaur Hall. In structure it closely resembles the trachodon, but is distinguished from it by a great bony crest that extends upward from the back of the skull, which in life evidently supported a flexible membrane similar to the living basiliscus.

On shore there were other hoofed quadrapedal kinds with large heads protected by horns, the monoclonius and its allies. They were remarkable for their enormous skulls, frequently five feet in length and four feet across the frill portion, with a long horn surmounting the nose and a small horn over each eye. The brain was smaller in proportion to the size of the skull than in any known animal above the class of fishes, and of a very low type of structure.

But most striking and grotesque of all was the ankylosaurus. Covered with armor-plate from nose to tip of tail, it was the veritable Dreadnought of the swamps which could bid defiance to the contemporaneous flesh-eaters. It was a herb-eater, with very small teeth and a turtle-shaped beak. It walked on four short legs and was approximately fifteen feet long. In the middle its body was wider than the mastodon and so covered with large flat plates that it could well have been indifferent to the attack of the flesh-eaters. The ribs were solidly united to the back bones, and the tail terminated in a ponderous club-shaped affair, similar to the glyptodon, which it resembles in many ways, though in no sense related.

No lions lived then to stalk these sluggish beasts, but there were no less formidable creatures of the same order to prey upon them—the flesh-eating dryptosaurus. Like the tyrannosaurus of later date it walked upright on massive birdlike feet, the body balanced by a long powerful tail. Its front legs were extremely small. The huge skull, four feet in length, was armed with rows of dagger-like teeth capable of rending the toughest skin. Standing erect fifteen feet in height, the drytosaurus may well have struck terror in the hearts of the peaceful herb-eaters, and it requires no great stretch of the imagination to picture the combats between two such powerful engines of destruction.

Future Exhibition.

The carload of fossils collected last Summer in the Belly River formation includes nine skulls and three partial skeletons, with sufficient supplementary material to mount these three skeletons. A fourth skeleton now being prepared was collected last year.

As soon as a new hall can be provided in which to exhibit them the museum can exhibit skeletons of the characteristic large cretaceous dinosaurs—prosaurolophus, monoclonius, ankylosaurus, and dryptosaurus. Some of the skulls represent new genera and species not heretofore known to science, others were previously known only from fragments.

American museum parties have collected three carloads of fossils from this locality, yet the field is by no means exhausted; there erosion is so rapid that for all time the Red Deer River will be classic hunting ground for cretaceous dinosaurs.

FINESSE OF THE NEW YORK BOOK AUCTIONEER IMPRESSES HUNGARIAN PLAYWRIGHT

Visitor Hears the Proofs of the Versatility of "The Apostle of Wisdom and Knowledge."

The following account of how a typical New York book auction looks and sounds to a foreigner was written by Arpad Pasztor, a Hungarian playwright and journalist, who is now in this country studying immigration problems, on which he will report to his Government. The original of this sketch in Hungarian was sent to a home paper by its author.

By Arpad Pasztor.

THE scene is on lower Broadway, among the skyscrapers. Round about are New York's greatest business blocks, thirty and forty stories high, receiving and discharging in a day hundreds and thousands of workers, the lift boys never resting all day long, forever taking their sudden flights away up above the clouds almost, and then back again with the swiftness of birds.

On the top of the forty-second story of the Singer Building the American flag waves briskly in the breeze, while down in the depths of Broadway flows the river of human beings, never ceasing, always surging, pushing, whirling as a turbulent stream between two steep mountain cliffs.

High over our heads the elevated comes whirling toward us from downtown, taking its many passengers in a very few minutes from one end of the great city to another.

It is noon. From Staten Island comes the deep boom of a cannon, and the eating factories—for they may appropriately be called that here in New York—are quickly filled with a hungry crowd of office, store, and factory people, pushing and shoving as they rush into the street, happily chewing their gum, and glad of a little sixty minutes of freedom.

But during this swift rush for something to eat, one of New York's stores is just opening. A sign is hanging over the door, and we read that a book auction takes place there to-day promptly at 12 o'clock noon.

Inside, thousands of books are lying, piled in tubs and baskets or stacked in rows on the floor. The auctioneer mounts a little platform and from there shouts his goods.

The place is soon filled. Outside is blistering Summer, inside, delightful coolness, but nevertheless, almost everybody is in his shirt sleeves. The auctioneer, too. He is a rosy-cheeked, short-mustached gentleman with his hair parted carefully in the middle. His trousers are supported by a belt only. He waits a few moments, looks slowly around to see if there are enough of us in the shop, drinks a glass of water and then begins:

"Gentlemen, I greet you in the kingdom of books, in the castle of learning and progress. We have here on display to-day the treasures of mankind. Books, printed letters, rule the riches of the world, not Rajahs, Kings, and Emperors.

"You have gathered here for a book auction. You wish to buy new and good books cheaply. You believe yourselves to be buyers and me the seller, but I am not that; I am only a poor apostle, the apostle of wisdom and knowledge and literature, and I am here in the service of my fellow-men, to convert you to the gospel of art and civilization. I do not place a fixed price on anything, because they are priceless, but do not be ashamed to offer any price you wish. To be poor is no shame, but to be rich and grasping is shameful. [Turning to his assistant:] My friend in the spreading of knowledge, what bunch of books is that in your hand?"

"The works of Walter Scott."

"All right; the novels of Walter Scott—'Marmion,' 'Ivanhoe,' 'Quentin Durward,' 'The Antiquary'—and many other old acquaintances of ours. The books of our youth. It has been one hundred years since they were written, but still these editions are new, proving that the great writers live forever. In France alone over 1,400,000 copies were sold of this edition.

"It is true they are novels, but within them the true history of Scotland is told. The history of Scotland, whence more than one American hero sprang.

"Gentlemen, what do you offer me for Sir Walter Scott? Each one for himself. [Looks around.] For a hundred years past? [Looks around again. In the store, dead silence.] Nobody? Nothing?"

From some remote corner a weak female voice is heard.

"One dollar."

The auctioneer's eyes flare up in indignation.

"Did you hear that? Ha, ha, ha!—a book fit for a King, the great Sir Walter Scott—one dollar! * * * Oh, poor old Scott, why is it that thou art so popular? But take it, Madame! Let the others feel ashamed of themselves that they did not even offer a dollar for Walter Scott."

His friend in the spreading of knowledge quickly ties up the bundle of books with string and tosses them to the lady. The auctioneer continues:

"Therefore, the work of Walter Scott is only worth a dollar. Any one else want one? Nobody? Well, what is that now in your hand, that lovely bound book?"

"Switzerland, in words and pictures."

"All right! Switzerland, by pen and brush. The work of our best authors and artists, containing also impressions by the great Victor Hugo of that beautiful country. His own letters! By his own hand! (Strikes the title page three times with his hand.) Ladies and gentlemen, who among you dares to assume that should she or he happen to travel in Switzerland, those same thoughts and ideas would come into his or her mind as into that of the great Hugo? Who would be so stupid and unmannered? Here, Victor Hugo thinks in our place, in this book his comparisons are seen with our own eyes, his unlimited imaginations play upon our fancies, and we see all that he has seen.

"Well? What is the Switzerland worth to you? What is Victor Hugo worth?"

"Fifty cents." (From a student.) Everybody laughs. The auctioneer also for a moment, but his smile immediately changes to a sneer.

"Good, just laugh! Behold a young student. Fifty cents is all the money he has. So Victor Hugo and Switzerland is worth to him all he has. Here it is. Take it, young man, and in times to come you can tell your children of how, here in the United States, you could buy Victor Hugo and Switzerland together for fifty cents. I do not give this book to you but to the future. Take it! (Tosses it over to him.)

"Now follows—yes—here it is—Edgar Allan Poe in three volumes. The great American poet. He comes from us, but he belongs to the world. Who does not know 'The Raven'? Who has not repeated, at some time or another, these wonderful lines, [throws his head back, his face becomes wistful as he reads:]

Once upon a midnight dreary, while
I pondered weak and weary,
Over many a quaint and curious volume of forgotten lore.

"Not only that, but all of his poems and stories are contained in these three volumes. Now, who wants the pride of America—how much?"

Somebody calls out: "Two dollars."

The Auctioneer: "Good! So America prizes its greatest poet at two dollars? What comes next? Gibson's drawings?

"Brava! These are the Gibson's drawings! Up to date! Gibson's fine collection of American girls! Here! Look! Charles Dana Gibson's most popular drawings! The Eternal Question: Yes or No? Going to Work—who wants them? How much am I offered?"

I speak up too: "Thirty cents."

"Did you hear what this gentleman says? Thirty cents for Charles Dana Gibson! Does America esteem its art so little?"

"But I am a foreigner."

"Foreigner? Then take it, and proclaim to the world what American art is. Take it away and tell them how you bought Charles Dana Gibson for thirty cents! The Stars and Stripes forever!"

"What have we now?"

"The World's Animals."

"All right, 'The World's Animals.' Rich societies, learned men, professors, artists, travelers, have all contributed to this work that they might present it to the world. It took fifteen years to complete it and ten million dollars. Offer something, somebody. Who has the heart to offer one or two dollars for a treasure worth a million? Come on, offer something!"

A Policeman: "One dollar."

"Hah! [Slaps his head.] Who was that? One dollar against ten million? What? A policeman? One who often has to watch even more than that for nothing! Here is the book. One dollar. Take it, friend."

And, wiping his perspiring brow, he steps down from his platform while his companion takes his place.

In Berlin.

New Yorker—Would you like to go to one of the famous beer gardens here?

His Bride—Oh, John, aren't there any champagne gardens?

Magistrate—In what way did her large hat annoy you?

Barber—In the subway, your Honor.

ANONYMOUS PHILANTHROPY IS GREATLY INCREASING

Many Donors of Big Sums Are Hiding Their Identity—Modesty Plays Its Part, But One of the Impelling Motives for Anonymity Is the Avoidance of Begging Letters.

THE anonymous millionaire givers to good works have been so active the past fortnight as to arouse speculation as to their motives and identity. Judging by the reports of the Young Men's Christian Association, the great universities and hospitals, the anonymous form of giving is more popular than ever.

From unnamed sources alone the former organization in the first five days of this month's campaign for its $4,000,000 fund received $346,500. This is unparalleled in the history of the association, as a half a century ago three years were required to raise a like amount from all sources, anonymous and otherwise.

Nowadays, however, single gifts amounting to hundreds of thousands of dollars find their way anonymously to the organization's treasury. The largest donation so made was $215,000, on the first day of the November campaign. It was made by a woman.

Another anonymous gift was for $50,000, but it was expected in time that this benefactor would declare himself. From the fact that one of the men's "teams" in the collecting contest reported an additional secret pledge of $25,000, it may be assumed that not all the anonymous giving is done by women. The total to the credit of men who prefer to hide their identity was increased by an additional $25,000 cabled from abroad by a man who said that he wanted time "to come home and consult with my wife as to whether it shall be made in her name or mine."

Some one who aimed to pay a graceful tribute to the late Robert R. McBurney, the Young Men's Christian Association worker, sent $15,000 anonymously, in memoriam. There was another secret gift of $5,000, besides several of $2,000 and $1,000 each.

A definite religious basis may doubtless be cited in the endeavor to account for a certain percentage of the anonymous Y. M. C. A. gifts of today. It is less easy to explain why other and more secular gifts are being recorded from time to time as coming from unknown sources.

Attention has been attracted this month by the anonymous $500,000 donated for a great College of Commerce in New York City. While it is declared that this comes from a member of the Chamber of Commerce, and guesses have been made as to his identity, the fact is that the giver is not known. Here is a new departure in large scale benefactions, because the project of a first-class commercial museum and college for higher education in commerce is an innovation in this country, although Munich and other foreign centres have such institutions. If the popular acclaim that would ordinarily go to the philanthropist in such a case is necessarily lacking in the present instance, he undoubtedly experiences his own satisfaction.

Gift for Fine Arts.

Another anonymous November donor is he who gave, earlier in the month, $250,000 as an endowment of the Fine Arts at Columbia University. The giver concealed his identity by acting through a third person, and the method of using the gift is detailed in a letter to the Trustees. A number of benefactions of $50,000 each have been given anonymously to Barnard College, affiliated with Columbia.

Another educational institution benefiting by enormous sums from unknown sources is the Massachusetts Institute of Technology in New England, which celebrated its fiftieth anniversary in 1911. Not long after, a gift of $2,500,000 was received from an anonymous donor, who has come to be known among "Tech" men as the "Mysterious Mr. Smith." A month ago $600,000 additional reached the institute from the same source. This money is to be used in constructing the great white city which is to be the new home of the institution. Ultimately twelve acres of ground will be occupied on the Cambridge side of the Charles River, near the Harvard Bridge, the cost of the buildings when completed to be $10,000,000.

This greatest centre of technical instruction in the world will be a vast group of connecting, harmonious structures. The educational group will comprise connected buildings, four stories high, clustered about the library. The latter is to be the central feature in the arrangements, with a great dome 200 feet high overlooking a court open to the river front.

The largest gift perhaps ever made anonymously was announced by President Jacob Gould Schurman of Cornell University on Nov. 15. This was for $4,300,000 to be used as endowment for the Cornell Medical College. None of the income arising from this extensive benefaction is to be used for new buildings or equipment. All of it is to be devoted to maintaining the Medical School of the university, situated in New York City.

A novel method of attracting semi-anonymous gifts was inaugurated a few months ago at Harvard University. A trust, known as the Harvard Mutual Foundation, has been formed to run for twenty years after the death of the last survivor of a group of twenty-one designated persons. In the ordinary course of events it is estimated that this will give the trust a life of about 100 years.

The trust is created with power to hold donations of funds and property from men who desire to provide an assured income for their immediate heirs, and have the property then go to Harvard. Already gifts to the value of $250,000 have been received by the trust, which has invested the funds and agreed to pay 5 per cent. of the net income to the giver or his heirs during their lifetime, and upon their death turn over the principal to the university. It is expected that other large sums will be given to the trust from time to time, to be disposed of similarly.

The names of the donors and the individual amounts are not made public. By this system the university is assured of a growing endowment, while the benefactors may be satisfied that their fortunes will pass on in a manner satisfactory to them, at the same time providing for their immediate wants and those of their families.

Anonymous givers have various methods of arranging for their philanthropies. Two years ago, for insance, an old gentleman, plainly dressed and with nothing to suggest that he was not simply a retired business man out for a morning stroll, walked into the Hahnemann Hospital office in New York City and said:

"Can I see through the wards?"

"Certainly," replied the Superintendent. "I am going on my daily rounds in a few minutes, and will be glad to show you the hospital."

The caller had a volley of questions, and as he walked through some partly filled wards asked why there were not more charity patients there, considering the supposed need of increased hospital facilities.

"We have a waiting list of fifty or more, but haven't the money to take them, you see," explained the Superintendent. "Each patient would cost us $2 a day. At this rate we would need about $37,000 additional funds per annum. Where are we to obtain the cash?"

The old gentleman said nothing. On completing the inspection of the hospital he declared that he had spent "a good half-hour," thanked the Superintendent, and walked out.

Some time afterward this official read in the newspapers that a millionaire had died and left $750,000 to Hahnemann Hospital. On comparing the name with the visitors' register it developed that this benefactor was the anonymous caller of the previous Spring.

One of the most generous gifts ever made to the Presbyterian Hospital in New York City was by a friend who preferred to act through a third party. It was a trust endowment of money and securities amounting to $1,300,000. The income arising from this benefaction is used exclusively toward the support of the scientific and educational work connected with the hospital and its affiliated teaching body, the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Columbia University.

They Gave Through Morgan.

How many millions of dollars were given anonymously during the past few years through the late J. Pierpont Morgan will doubtless never be known. The fact is, however, that he found time to be the almoner of several wealthy men, who in this way were in the habit of substantially aiding various philanthropic works. It is supposed that there were about a dozen very rich men giving away money in this novel fashion.

Considerable mystery has been thrown around the matter, but it is possible to say that at least three of the men concerned were large contributors to certain charities in their own names. As Mr. Morgan was always looked upon as a princely giver himself, though by no means in the Rockefeller or Carnegie class, it was practicable to carry out the arrangement without exciting unusual comment. If any particular gift seemed inexplicable as coming from him, it would have been a simple matter for Mr. Morgan to say that certain clients of his desired a contribution made in that manner. So well has the secret been guarded, however, that perhaps not more than a score of people are familiar with it.

The assumption is reasonable that the object of these philanthropists, in resorting to such an odd mode of dispensing charity, was to save themselves from the deluge of appeals from societies and individuals that descends upon any donor nowadays whose benefactions become a matter of public record. Here is discovered a motive for some anonymous gifts. Often the donors are controlled not by modesty but by a desire for self-protection against the thousands of letters that follow widely heralded public giving.

How many persons have a clear idea of the size of the mail of the multi-millionaire philanthropist? In talking with Charles C. Tegethoff, agent of the Harriman estate, the writer of this article was informed that over 20,000 begging letters had been sent to Mrs. Edward H. Harriman in two years, over 800 letters a month, all the year around, asking for money. An analysis of but 6,000 of these showed an aggregate of $267,000,000 of requests. It is not surprising that it was necessary for her to give up the attempt to read them all, as the task would have required her entire time. Had she responded according to the demands made, her entire fortune would long ago have been disbursed.

The mail of Vincent Astor is flooded with hundreds of letters asking for large sums, according to his secretary, William A. Dobbyn. These come from all over the United States, in such quantity that it is a problem to handle them. If he attempted to consider them all, Mr. Astor would have little time left for his own interests.

The same situation confronted William Ziegler, Jr., when he first came into the possession of his fortune. The flow of letters began, indeed, even before the courts had completed turning his inheritance over to him.

According to Jerome D. Greene, who is connected with John D. Rockefeller's philanthropies, approximately 500 letters a day reach the "Oil King." This is about twenty an hour. They come from every part of the globe, one day's mail alone bringing letters from no less than twenty-two countries. The aid requested ranges from $5 to $1,000,000.

The situation is much the same with other rich men. No sooner had James Buchanan (Diamond Jim) Brady announced his intention of giving $750,000 to Johns Hopkins University Hospital than his mail took a big jump. His own description of the change is illuminating.

Foreigners Beg Hard.

"Yes, I get about 500 begging letters a day now," he said to the writer. "The average is 100 a day in the dullest season. I get 'em from every corner of the earth. I had a translator once, but I had to let him go because the only letters I got in foreign languages were begging ones. French, German, Spanish, Italian, Swedish, Russian—they all go into the waste basket now. Let's see what's in this batch."

About 100 letters had just been placed on his desk by a clerk. They were all in English, and from every part of the United States. Mr. Brady glanced over them, commenting on the contents of those he opened.

"Funny that none of these begging letters is typewritten," he said. "Here is a man who wants $30,000 for a new church. The next letter asks for $1,000,000 for a new hospital.

I don't believe there's 1,000 people in the town that comes from. And yet the woman wants a hospital bigger than Bellevue. Here's a boy wants a motor cycle—that's easy. Here's a woman who doesn't want any money. She just asked about my illness, and thinks her father has the same thing I had. I'll have to answer that."

These letters were surprisingly similar, and displayed little originality. Most of them began with "Dear Sir"; a few started with "His Excellency." Some wanted various sums as loans, while a few frankly asked for gifts of thousands. It was Mr. Brady's opinion that some of the correspondents really needed money and would pay it back. His benefactions in many directions, mostly anonymous, would make another story.

A comparatively unknown business man told the writer recently that he had become a member of a society which conducts a large hospital in New York City, and that in due course his name, address, and amount of his gift appeared in the annual report. Then the flow of begging letters started toward him and has kept up, to his annoyance. Now he is considering how to get his name off the list and give anonymously to the hospital.

Appealing for charities and good works through the medium of the mails has become so universal, and is done on so large a scale, according to John A. Kingsbury, General Agent of the New York Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor, that it has not been easy of late to raise much money in that manner. "The people have become somewhat callous," Mr. Kingsbury added. This is scarcely to be wondered at when it is remembered that approximately 100,000,000 begging letters are sent out to wealthy philanthropists each year, calling for thousands of millions of dollars.

An interesting question is raised by the consideration as to whether anonymous giving is generally popular among the multi-millionaire philanthropists, and if so along what lines.

On turning to the record we find that during a single week in June of the present year over half a million dollars was given by anonymous donors. More than half, or $350,000, was for religious purposes, and divided between the New York Cathedral of St. John the Divine and the Drew Theological Seminary at Madison, N. J. The balance was for educational work, $125,000 to Princeton University for the foundation of a chair in history and $105,000 for an art museum at Vassar.

Question as to Hetty Green.

Of the $500,000 contributed by residents of New York City last Spring for the sufferers in the Dayton, Ohio, floods only one gift of any considerable size was reported as given anonymously; it was for $5,000. In this connection the question has been raised if Mrs. Hetty Green is not accustomed to give generously in secret. Of all the persons of large wealth who were in this country at the time of the floods in Dayton, only the names of Mrs. Green and one or two others were not noticed in the list of those who publicly contributed to the relief fund.

The great bulk of secret gifts made in 1912 in America was for general religious work. A considerable part of the religious gifts, a round $100,000,000 was donated on a subscription and "weekly envelope offering" basis, yet it is undoubted that millions of dollars in the aggregate reached the treasuries of the various churches and temples anonymously in the collection plates. Churches like St. Thomas's and St. Bartholomew's in New York City sometimes average from $10,000 to $20,000 on Easter Sunday. The Spanish Church on West 156th Street, near Broadway, was enriched not long ago by a donor who secretly placed five $1,000 bills in the alms box.

It seems to be the case that the benefactors of charitable institutions more often give openly. According to the most recently published list of contributors to the New York Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor, not much more than $14,000 of the $177,000 given during the year is recorded as coming from anonymous sources. The range of these gifts was from 25 cents to sums in four figures. There were two unknown donors of $1,000 each, one of $800, three of $500, one of $300, five of $250, two of $200, one of $150, three of $125, and thirteen of $100 each. The remaining anonymous $6,000 was given in smaller sums by 536 separate contributors. A large part of the total was for fresh air work and Sea Breeze Hospital. During the same period George H. F. Schrader gave the association $32,000 over his own name, and John D. Rockefeller $14,545.

In connection with the former a story is told illustrating how strangers become interested in and contribute to philanthropic work. In an effort to raise money for a hospital to treat sick children the association's officials had vainly interviewed as many wealthy men and women as would give them audience. Letters were written and advertisements inserted in the papers without results. Finally a meeting of the Executive Committee was held, and the proposal was made to abandon the project temporarily. Then the telephone bell rang.

The Chairman stepped into the booth and in a few moments reappeared, asking who "George H. F. Schrader" was. Nobody recalled the name.

"Well," the Chairman went on, "he called me up to say that he had read our appeal in the morning paper, and would be glad to see some one at his home about the project. He lives out in Westchester County." After a short discussion it was agreed to send a committee there on the afternoon train.

The members of the committee were driven from the country station over a road that wound around rocky eminences, until suddenly an unpretentious cottage half hidden by shrubs and trees came into view. They were greeted on the veranda by a tall, thin man, with iron-gray hair. The committee members sat down in an embarrassed manner and exchanged commonplaces about the weather. The master of the house began to speak of his travels in Iceland and Norway. Then he invited them to see his gardens.

The time passed rapidly, when the professional member of the committee said something about an engagement at the Academy of Medicine.

"But what of your hospital project?" questioned his host, wheeling around abruptly. "You haven't mentioned it."

This broke the ice, and from the recently tongueied committee came a torrent of talk about the need of more beds for crippled boys and girls, the newest advances in surgery, estimates of cost of buildings, and expenses.

Their host was a good listener, but interrupted occasionally to ask questions. He excused himself when they returned to the house, and went into his study, reappearing presently with a slip of paper.

"Will $25,000 be enough to start the hospital?" he asked, holding out the check. Although undesirous of publicity, Mr. Schrader did not insist on anonymity.

Altogether $1,000,000 would be a fair estimate of the amount of anonymous gifts made to the association for all purposes during the seventy years of its existence.

The writer recalls a few generous sums given anonymously through Alfred T. White, President of the Brooklyn Bureau of Charities. On one occasion a lady called at the office of the bureau and handed a sealed envelope to the cashier. As she walked out, the envelope was opened, disclosing two $100 bills, with a paper marked "From a Friend, for the work of the Bureau of Charities."

The Record of 1912.

The Charity Organization Society of New York in 1912 recorded a few anonymous gifts; one of $12,500 for the general work of the department for the improvement of social conditions; another of $6,500 for the work of the Committee on Criminal Courts; a third of $5,000 for the Committee on the Prevention of Tuberculosis, and miscellaneous gifts from 138 persons amounting to $10,447 for relief purposes. In addition the latter fund was enriched by contributions amounting to $3,250 from 320 unknown persons. Forty-five contributions, amounting to $578.62, came through "A Friend." Another unnamed gave $501.67, the subscriptions of fifty-two people. An individual gave $500, another gave $450, and two others $100 each. The bulk of the relief funds, however, about $62,000, was received from known sources.

According to the report of the New York Hospital for Deformities and Joint Diseases, which receives about $47,000 a year from various sources, less than $2,000 comes anonymously. And all but $150 of the latter was in small sums, ranging from $1 to $50.

The year 1912 was a banner one in respect of gifts and bequests to educational, charitable, religious, and other organizations of a public character. They reached the immense total of $241,821,719, surpassing any previous year by approximately $100,000,000.

Of this total, the anonymous gifts of which there is a public record amounted to only $3,934,000. The bulk of this, or over $3,000,000, went to educational institutions. The Massachusetts Institute of Technology led with $2,500,000, while Hamilton College and the Yale Forestry School each received $100,000. Mt. Holyoke College got $50,000; Brown University, $40,000; the Moody Schools, $25,000; Wallace and Bates Colleges, $10,000 each.

More than half of the balance of the anonymous gifts for the year were for religious purposes. The largest was $150,000 to a New York church, $125,000 was given to the Presbyterian Ministers' Fund, $100,000 went to the Hartford Theological Seminary. The Union Theological Seminary received $50,000. One unique gift was of $25,000 for a Young Men's Christian Association Hotel. A like amount was given to the Colored Young Men's Christian Association in Cincinnati. The Salvation Army came in for $10,000. A church in Saybrook received $80,000, and two other churches got gifts of $10,000 and $5,000 respectively.

About $250,000 was given anonymously to hospitals. The Locomotor Ataxia Hospital in Chicago and the Mental Hygiene Association each received $100,000. The Jewish Hospital in Denver and the New York Animal Hospital each got $25,000.

Only two anonymous gifts are on record as having been presented for charitable work, and these were $5,000 each to Milwaukee and Cincinnati.

But four sums of any size were donated to miscellaneous objects. The largest was $10,000 to a conservatory of music in New York. There were gifts of $5,000 each to the American Museum of Safety, to Forest Park, St. Louis, and to a cemetery association in Wisconsin.

CHARLES G. GATES RANKED "ACE HIGH" IN CODY, WYOMING

A CORRESPONDENT in Cody, Wyo., writes that the visit of the late Charles G. Gates is still the chief topic of conversation in that place, which is stated not to have been so stirred since a mysterious pair of horsemen held up the First National Bank and shot the cashier.

Gates's prodigal generosity and his shrewd comments upon men and things furnished a sensation fresh every hour while he was in Cody. There was nothing counterfeit in the sorrow of the men who had known him in the hills when the word went out that he was dead. There is nothing counterfeit now in the mist which dims their eyes when they speak of him.

"No, Sir," said an old-timer, who followed one of the big herds from Texas in 1881 or thereabouts, "I don't know there was a feller like him in the world."

Gates, the Cody man writes, was appreciative of disinterested kindnesses to a degree, considerate of those he liked, and he took to camp life like a duck to water, chopping wood, shoveling snow, and assisting with the camp "wash." He gave away thousands of dollars in a day, but it was quickly learned that he would not be "gouged" out of even two "bits." His keen estimate of men and their motives was a joy to the Cody community, which is still chortling in glee over a rebuff handed out to one of its "leading citizens."

This person, of a type common to Western towns, a type which meets the incoming stranger with a dinner invitation in one hand and something which it is desired to promote in the other, attempted to point out to Gates the mistake he was making in choosing for his companions the Western "rough necks," the men of the mountains and ranches and ranges who make no pretense of being anything other than what they are.

"Now that your hunt is over," said the leading citizen with unction, "we want you to meet some of our representative people. Of course, those fellows are all right in the mountains, but—"

Gates looked at him with slightly widened eyes.

"Why, they're the finest crowd of boys I ever met. I like 'em—I love 'em—every one of 'em. They're good enough for me any old time and place."

"Certainly, certainly, but now I've just hired a car for the day, and I'll show you around myself. I'd like you to look over—"

Gates rose up on his hind legs, as it were, and eyed the leading citizen with amused contempt.

"What would I go with you for? The woods are full of huckleberries like you. I meet 'em by the hundred every day back East. Say, you go to —." And Gates rode off merrily in his own car with the "rough-necks." The leading citizen is stated still to wear a dazed look in his eyes from the unaccustomed jolt.

When Gates sent for the rector of the Episcopal church to ask him the amount of the church debt, he gave the young parson a quick glance and observed candidly, "You've got a good face, but a poor overcoat"—a matter which he speedily remedied by the purchase of the best garment that "Davey" Jones's outfitting establishment afforded.

The "yellow-back" cow-puncher, who put his foot over a banknote which Gates dropped, got away with it without comment, but not with the delusion that he had deceived its owner. Gates merely turned his head and gave him a level stare, but he never spoke to the puncher again.

GUARDING THE HEALTH OF 700,000 SCHOOL CHILDREN

Physical Training and Hygiene Are Steadily Improving the Efficiency of New York's Younger Generation.

NOON GAMES IN THE SCHOOL YARD.

By Dr. C. Ward Crampton.
Director of Physical Training, New York Board of Education.

THE human race is unique in that it sends its young to school for five hours a day for 200 days a year for eight years.

New York City children are gathered into school houses by the beneficent city and State to fit them for good citizenship and happy and efficient living. In one year 700,000,000 hours of instruction are given by the City of New York at a cost of nearly $40,000,000.

While this wholesale segregation of the young of a race is necessary to fit it for adult functioning, it introduces a wholly artificial element into their lives. Normal activity is restricted. House air is substituted for out of doors, books for trees and running brooks, electric light for sun light, and school tasks for farm chores. A natural child, with a body that has not changed materially in 20,000 years, finds an unnatural environment.

The city owes an education to the child, but it owes also to the public a warrant that schooling shall not devitalize the race. The Department of Education has given to its sub-department of physical training the solution of this problem, with the idea that not only shall health be preserved but that the process of learning should result in physical and hygienic training which will make for vigor and efficiency and not merely absence of disease.

The annual report presented to the Board of Education at a recent meeting indicates the vigorous methods introduced, and shows to the citizens of New York the high effort quietly working in their service.

Notable among the achievements of this department has been the introduction of the new course of study in physical training for boys. This supplants the old fashioned one-two-three movements with a consistent programme of educational hygienic and corrective exercises. New boy-like athletic movements are brought into the gymnasium, and the boys engage in a course of moderate athletic training, including hygiene, which is the basis of all athletics. Thus natural enthusiasms are utilized for constructive school purposes.

Training Rules.

The ten thousand boys who assembled last June in Central Park to exhibit physical training work were given the following set of training rules:

Go to bed at 9 o'clock after a thorough wash and a cold splash over chest and trunk; teeth and gums well scrubbed. Clothes and books ready for to-morrow.

Bedroom windows open top and bottom.

Rise not a minute later than 7 o'clock. Go through two-minute drill and hygienic exercises for demonstration. Clean face and neck and scrub hands. Finish up with a big cold splash and hard ru' all over. See that feet and legs ar ean, and rub them hard to get them into condition. Brush teeth and gums thoroughly.

Breakfast and all meals:

No coffee. No tea. Drink milk, a little at a time. Chew all food to a pulp. Ask your teacher what foods to avoid.

No smoking! Cut out all habits you know are bad.

Exercise in the fresh air, equivalent to a slow mile run a day. Walk ten miles a week. If you lose weight you lose vitality; stop work.

Before school look yourself over. "Am I clean from head to toe? Are all my clothes clean and in order down to the skin? Do I stand like an athlete?"

The boy has no use for hygiene, but he has for athletics, and the school interested in hygiene makes use of this fact to gain its end.

Play space is so rare children now have to be taught to play. This is done as part of the regular work, and it becomes effective when school is out. Last year twenty-four school playgrounds were unlocked and opened for the children of the street. Three hundred and sixty-two thousand children attended. The wider use of the school plant is being solved by the after-school athletic centre.

Physical defects are noted by the physicians of the Department of Health, but the school has a function in preventing some of them at least. The prevalence of flat foot in the high schools has shown a marked decrease, probably due in some degree to the corrective work done by the high school teachers and the vigorous folk dancing and athletics of the elementary school.

Flat foot is the result of constitutional weakness, or a lack of proper use of the foot, or both. It is not caused by walking on hard pavements nor by high-heeled shoes. In high schools all students are examined for this defect, and all who have it are taught special exercises to do at home and are given special attention in a gymnasium.

The fact that 90 per cent. of the first-year high school children have one or more decayed teeth has led the department to take preliminary steps to solve this problem. The Board of Health has opened clinics for school children in six districts, manned by nine dentists. At Public School 29, Manhattan, a dental clinic was opened on Jan. 15, and the total treatments for nine months were 2,099. The system will gradually be extended until placed within the reach of every child.

An investigation was made into the physical characteristics of truants, with the hope of formulating a means of prevention for truancy. In the truant schools the child is given free activity in gymnastics, athletics, games, military drill, farm and shop work, which are regulated with the specific purpose of increasing interest in school activity.

A new course of study in hygiene, now under trial in the schools, has for its foundation the idea that construction should affect the daily life of the pupil; that it is more important to be clean than to know the structure of the skin; to use a toothbrush every day than to draw a good diagram of a tooth. Nurses of the Board of Health give instructions to pupils in toothbrush drills and in mouth hygiene.

The effect of athletics is indicated by the fact that out of 327 specific cases, 258 showed that athletics have a favorable effect upon scholarship; 61 reported little or no effect, and 5 cases showed that athletics hindered good scholarship. This favorable result means that the Principals in general are using athletics wisely.

Measles and Scarlet Fever.

The department is on the alert to apply each new medical discovery for the good of the pupil. One of the most important recent discoveries has been the fact that measles and scarlet fever are probably spread by coughing and sneezing. The annual report on this subject says:

The annual recurrence of measles and scarlet fever in almost epidemic form among our school children is a constant menace to the health of the city. The occurrence of 551 cases of measles and 338 cases of scarlet fever in one week makes serious inroads upon the attendance of pupils, not only among those who are actually sick but among those who are required to stay at home on account of quarantine. The City of New York suffers an annual loss of many children who are required to take their work over again on account of such illness. From an economical standpoint alone the Department of Education is seriously concerned; from the standpoint of the health of the community every father and mother must look to every city department to prevent the growing evil.

Measles is not to be lightly disregarded, for the resulting decrease in vitality often places the child under a most serious disadvantage in resisting tuberculosis.

In course of the co-operation with other departments the children of the school for the deaf were carefully examined by Dr. McAuliffe. In this school children are taught to speak and to see and understand what is spoken by lip reading. Their connection with the outside world depends upon the ability of the eyes to note the fine movements of the lips in speaking. It was startling to find that in eighty deaf pupils examined seventy-seven pairs of eyes were defective.

An experiment in room disinfection was undertaken. In order to ascertain the best methods, correspondence with various cities was undertaken and search made for a cheap and effective plan. The result of these tests has shown a beneficial effect on the health of the pupils.

The department is coming to the conclusion that the main defects in school ventilation are overheating and air stagnation. On its recommendation, the temperature of the rooms was reduced from 68-72 degrees to 65-68. Experiments were undertaken to observe the benefit obtained by keeping the air in constant circulation by electric fans, and Dr. Woodruff is now completing his final test to determine whether or not the children in the classrooms furnished with electric fans have profited.

The School Lunch Committee has performed excellent work, and is now a part of the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor. The average daily attendance at the luncheon, in each of the eight elementary schools in which the experiment was tried, was 1,721, and the total number of luncheons served during the year 226,325, an increase of 52,126 over last year. The receipts covered the cost of food and part of the cost of administration. Four additional central kitchens will be equipped, and it is planned to serve seventeen schools.

With the appropriation of $3,000 the department supplied sixty-five schools with phonographs and folk dance and marching records. As a result the marching has been changed from a slow, dragging, irregular step to a movement of energy, rhythm, and spirit.

Many improvements have been made in the school gymnasiums, which have added much to the efficiency of this department. The large gymnasiums have demonstrated their great usefulness.

The Department of Physical Training, in addition to the work of athletics, seeks to satisfy the needs of the school child as such during and after school. Recreation centres under Dr. Stitt are provided for adolescents not in school, and the vacation playgrounds under his charge are organized for all children during the Summer months. It is the function of physical training during the school session to teach appropriate forms of play and to have them practiced until the pupils learn how to enjoy and profit by what they have learned. This is true of our teaching folk dances to girls and of the new course of physical training for grammar boys, which is primarily athletic training.

After school this department, in conjunction with the Public Schools Athletic League, seeks to provide opportunity for play and to teach particularly valuable forms. Since 1903 daily progress has been made by improving physical training methods, introducing appropriate material, and, in after-school work, by vastly increasing athletics, folk dancing, and the like. All this work has one consistent purpose—that every school child shall have the incentive, ability, and opportunity for play. This progress is recorded in the annual reports of this department. It has been steady, purposeful, and based upon carefully conducted investigation.

During the past year and a half careful experimental work has been done in the development of after-school athletic centres. The children attended in large numbers and there was inaugurated a system of clubs in basket ball, baseball, hand ball, soccer, and track and field athletics. These gradually became self-sustaining, and carried on their own activities with a minimum of direction.

Organized athletics play an important part in public schools, and the policy of developing athletics has been extended until it embraces every possible branch. Contestants in competitions range from elementary school graduates to full-grown men attending classes of English to foreigners. In one event at a series of games on a relay team a father and son competed for the same school. Athletic meets are held throughout the year. During the Summer, Fall, and Spring the school athletic fields and public parks are used for this purpose, while armories, school gymnasiums, and other buildings are utilized in Winter.

Gains in Girls' Athletics.

The work done by the girls is summarized in the season's report by Miss Elizabeth Burchenal, Inspector of Athletics. She says:

In summing up the work for girls' athletics during the school year of 1912-13 it is gratifying to find that there has been an advance both in actual results and in the number of girls taking part in after-school athletics. With the number of teachers registered in the instruction classes remaining the same, more after-school clubs have been formed and over 5,000 more girls than last year have been reached.

Another indication of real advance is the increase in the number of girls qualifying in all-around athletics, as this means a full season of prescribed athletic practice, and is of much greater benefit to the individual girl than merely taking part in a contest.

The development of hockey for high schools and swimming for both elementary and high schools have been important advances.

There has been decided gain in schools where phonographs have been provided, and if more of these were provided throughout the city for the folk dancing a drawback to the after-school club work would be removed and there would, I believe, be a general gain in results.

We are now reaching 23,000 girls who are actually registered as members of athletic clubs conducted by teachers who give their services. This does not include the many additional thousands who during school work enjoy the practice of folk dancing and other activities introduced in the after-school work. But since it is the especial province of this department to provide after-school recreation, we cannot be satisfied until we have extended this to at least 75,000 girls.

HOW MEXICO AND THE MEXICANS LOOKED TO AN AMERICAN ACTOR

He Took the First English-Speaking Dramatic Company There and Was Fed on Surprises.

MEXICO has been written up from almost every angle lately, especially those of internal politics and military preparedness; but it remained for Mr. Edwin Mordant to give a NEW YORK TIMES reporter an entirely new view of Mexico from a theatrical standpoint.

Imagine a stage placed in theatre buildings of such architectural magnificence that we have nothing to compare with them here. Imagine at the same time theatrical companies performing in these palaces who have no knowledge of action or "business" and who simply repeat the words of a prompter whose box is on the stage and whose voice is often louder than those of the actors.

Imagine such a parrotlike repetition that when an American actor gave a weighty pause before delivering an important line the audience supposed he had forgotten his words. Imagine a country where, instead of having music between the acts, it is the custom to visit the dressing rooms of the actors and buy drinks. Imagine in one of these splendid theatres furniture which would make even Belasco gasp at the cost, combined with paper scenery that no actor could lean against without bringing down the house.

Mr. Mordant is now playing one of the leading parts in "At Bay," one of the big theatrical successes of this season, now playing at the Thirty-ninth Street Theatre. A few years ago he took his own stock company down to Mexico. Mr. Mordant is an old newspaper man who served his time as a reporter on some of the leading Baltimore newspapers and has never lost the trick of the trade. When he got back from Mexico he wrote out, solely for his own amusement and with no idea of publication, a little typewritten book telling what he had observed down there.

He showed it to THE TIMES reporter, who found it filled with keen observations on the political and social conditions in the southern republic. But what interested the reporter chiefly was the chapter dealing with Mr. Mordant's own experiences in conducting his stock company through this land of strange customs. He asked Mr. Mordant to lay the book aside and tell the story in his own way.

"My company," he said, "was the first English-speaking dramatic stock company to play there. They had had some operatic and musical comedy companies.

"At first, judging by some of their previous experiences, they thought we were fly-by-nights. As soon as they found we weren't, they became tremendously respectful and polite, and we never received greater courtesy anywhere than we did in Mexico.

"We found that incidental music had never been used during the action of plays, and seldom during the intermissions. The men were in the habit during intermissions of putting on their hats, smoking cigarettes, and rambling about the house. Those who chose to went behind the scenes, visited the actors in their dressing rooms, and ordered up drinks.

"Of course we put a stop to that, but it was hard to make the Mexicans understand why we didn't regard it as proper. One night the leader of the orchestra came in between acts and asked admission to my dressing room. Naturally he was admitted, and on his heels trooped four men, all of them cheerfully announcing that they wanted to order up a round of drinks. I ordered them out.

"They were put out, too, and they couldn't understand it. It appeared that they were stockholders in the company. They raised an awful howl, but finally it was explained to them that that sort of thing was not the custom in the United States, and that they would have to respect our Gringo prejudices, and afterward I became very well acquainted with them and found them to be very nice fellows.

"The stock companies down there don't study parts and rehearse plays. Out on the stage sits the prompter, under a raised hood near the footlights. He reads each line aloud, and the actors repeat after him.

"Often the promptor speaks so much louder than the actors that the audience will call, 'Not so loud!' There is no action or 'business,' and a performance is more like a queer recital than a play.

"Our method of production was a revelation. Many of the local managers have since adopted it.

"When we appeared in Belasco's 'The Wife,' I played John Rutherford, and in that play there are some long pauses to give effect. The Mexicans had been accustomed to prattle off their phrases after the prompter without an instant's pause. One gentleman in our company asked a Mexican the next day what he thought of the company, and the Mexican said he found it excellent. Then my friend said:

"'How do you like Mr. Mordant?'

"'Well, Señor, Mordant a very good actor, but he forgot his lines.'

"They had never seen lightning effects. They had never seen such a thing as a spotlight. To send the curtain up they used a big bell, like a dinner gong. Of course we cut that out and installed a buzzer, and it almost stupefied them. They couldn't understand how our men knew when to send the curtain up without a bell.

"I had never seen such splendid furniture used on the stage as they have there. The onyx tables, the beautiful rugs and carpets, the wonderful examples of carving were revelations in lavish expenditure—but the scenery was of paper. If an actor started to lean against a house he would probably go flying all the way through not only the house, but all the scenery back of it.

"You can't get supers in Mexico. Why? Because you can't train them. No Mexican can learn to be a super. 'The Christian' requires a mob scene, and you couldn't get a mob for love or money. I was playing John Storm, and when I had to deliver my lines I yelled off the stage to the imaginary mob.

"The costumers are the worst in the world. When we played 'Held by the Enemy' there was only one United States uniform in the company, and that belonged to me. We loaned it to a costumer as a model, and he turned out a set of what were supposed to be Federal uniforms, but they were all adorned with those big Mexican buttons, and instead of the felt hats the Union officers wore we were adorned with those tall, conical Mexican hats.

"There was one man in that play who had to perform seven parts. In one scene he was both the Confederate spy and the Union officer who detected him and had to arrest himself. He grabbed himself by the back of the neck and ran himself off the stage.

"If there is any noise in the audience during the action of the play it is promptly hissed down. This proved very disturbing at first, for we thought they were hissing us. After a few nights, though, we got used to it, and realized that they really meant it as a mark of respect for us.

"At the vaudeville theatres you pay not for the whole evening's entertainment, but for one act. If you don't like the act you can leave the theatre without having to pay for the next one. This is a very good plan, particularly if you are not satisfied with the quality of the performance. What a boon it would be here for the auditor who has to wade through a lot of bad acts to see one or two that are worthy!

"At these theatres they will present three one-act playlets, with the vaudeville numbers between. Many will just pay to see one playlet that has made a particular success. These one-act plays are shoved forward until the one produced last becomes the first, and new ones are being constantly produced.

"Their custom of honoring favorites back of the footlights is novel. Numbers of small bouquets are carried into the stage boxes in baskets. When a 'call' is taken, the bouquets are thrown against the curtain as it is descending, and will form a perfect shower of flowers.

"On the occasion of a benefit twelve doves, with legs tied and wings clipped, were thrown upon the stage, with confetti streamers tied to them. This shower of doves was a pretty thing to see, but it gave us pain instead of pleasure. The poor things struck the stage with such force that they were killed. It is like so many of the apparently beautiful customs in Mexico, notably the bullfights—cruelty disguised by flowers, confetti, and bright colors.

"They know nothing of our system of selling seats in advance, and it is difficult to find any one around the theatre or in the box office until the day of performance and during it. Their tickets are long strips of paper, with the location designated many times. In the case of the vaudeville theatres an attendant will come to the auditor at the end of an act, and if he wishes to remain for another act he pays for it and a portion of the ticket is torn off.

"Our experience down there was delightful. They treated us with the most charming courtesy after they found that we were all right."

AMAZING RENAISSANCE IS NOW SWEEPING ALL ASIA

Traveler of Wide Experience Declares That "The Reconstruction of Asia Is the Most Important Issue the World Has to Face."

NOTHING less than an Asiatic renaissance is resulting from the stupendous changes—political, educational, economic, social, and religious—in progress throughout the vast continent of the Orient.

Such is the deduction of George Sherwood Eddy, who deals with the modern movement there in a book entitled "The New Era in Asia," just published by the Methodist Book Concern. In this volume Mr. Eddy, who was appointed to the important post of Secretary for Asia by the International Committee of the Young Men's Christian Association, has massed the results of seventeen years of personal experience in all parts of the Indian Empire and in the near and extreme Orient.

The author was graduated from Yale in 1891. After finishing his theological course at Union and Princeton, he went to India in 1896. With the exception of a few short visits to New York, he has been there ever since.

During 1912-13, in company with Dr. John R. Mott, Mr. Eddy made the last of his many trips across Asia. He traversed India, Burma, Ceylon, the Straits Settlements, China, Korea, and Japan. The results of his travels are thus summed up in his book:

MR. EDDY SPEAKING IN THE OSAKA Y.M.C.A.

Roll Call of Nations.

Every year changes are taking place in the Orient, but on no preceding trip were there visible transformations so vast and far-reaching as during this past year. China had become a republic; Japan had made a distinct advance in constitutional government; Korea was adjusting herself to the new régime; the unrest in India was entering upon a new phase; and the Balkan war was changing the map of the Turkish Empire and affecting the Near East.

Asia is passing through a period of fundamental reconstruction, and the molds into which she hardens will determine her whole future life. The Renaissance and Reformation introduced a new era into Europe, the significance of which no one could have foreseen. The present changes in Asia are in many ways more vast and fundamental than those which took place in Europe in the fifteenth century. The reconstruction of Asia in these decades is the most important issue the world has to face.

A great awakening is sweeping over the whole of Asia. The same principles that created our Western civilization are at work to-day in the ancient East, bringing about the same great transformations there that they have wrought in the West. So vast and widespread is this awakening that it might well be called "The Renaissance of Asia." And yet it is more than this; it is an intellectual renaissance, a religious reformation and a nineteenth century of scientific and industrial development all combined. Greater in volume, in depth, and in power than the Renaissance of Europe five centuries ago, it may prove to be even greater in its significance also.

The population of Europe in the fifteenth century was less than 100,000,000, while that of Asia to-day is over 900,000,000, with more than twice the population of Europe, more than five times that of North and South America combined—half that of the habitable globe. Greater in rapidity than the awakening in the West, this combined renaissance and reformation is crowding into decades in Asia what was the slow growth of centuries on the Continent of Europe.

The changes in Asia have not only been sudden but thoroughgoing. First of all, there is a great political awakening in Asia. There has been a rapid development of nationality, patriotism, constitutional government, and military power far exceeding the same development in Europe both in its rapidity and extent.

Japan, chiefly, led the way in the opening of the Far East. The opening of her doors to Commodore Perry's peaceful armada in 1853 destined the opening of all Asia. The charter granted by the young Emperor in 1868, when he took the oath that the government should be according to public opinion, that justice should be administered, and that knowledge should be sought throughout the whole world, was the birthday not only of Japanese but of Asiatic liberty, the Magna Charta of a new political era in the entire Orient.

Japan's victory over China was really a victory for China as well as Japan, in that it destroyed the foundation of the old era and extended the political principles of the new. Japan's victory over Russia in 1905 was really a victory for the entire Eastern World. Not merely to her own advantage did Japan thus gain recognized equality among the great powers of the West. Within a month of the signing of the treaty of Portsmouth one stroke of the vermilion pencil of the Chinese Emperor had abolished the obsolete system of education in that empire and China had adopted the educational principles of the new era.

The next year the Shah of Persia was compelled to grant a Constitution to his people, and two years later the Young Turk Party brought on the revolution in Turkey. The news of Japan's victory flashed like an electric spark across Asia and sent a thrill of hope through the entire Eastern hemisphere.

An intense development of the spirit of nationalism and patriotism has swept through almost all the great peoples of Asia. This spirit has come to the East from the West. Not one of the great Oriental nations held this concept of patriotism, nor was there any word in most of the Eastern languages to express it, until these ideas came with the great principles of Western civilization. The patriarchal family and state, and absolutism in government crushed out all possibility of true nationalism, but to-day what a change! And this new sense of nationalism in the peoples of the East is a fact of incalculable blessing and promise. The intellectual, the economic, the social, and even the religious developments of Europe were based upon the nationalism and liberty of the free peoples of the West.

Japan is perhaps the most patriotic nation in the world. Indeed, there is an over-emphasis of this intense and exclusive nationalism there that will be modified when a wider perspective of humanity is developed. The patriotism of Japan almost startles the traveler. In 1901 soldiers and officers wrote petitions in their own blood, asking for permission to go to the front to have a part in taking Port Arthur or to lead some desperate charge. Men often committed hara-kiri if they were not allowed to go to the war. A condemned criminal gave up his last dinner before his execution that he might give the price of the meal thus saved to his country. The suicide of Gen. Nogi by hara-kiri on the death of the Emperor called forth a deep and almost nation-wide response from the Japanese people, and showed at once the strength and danger of this exclusive nationalism.

In books on China published before the Boxer war it was often stated that, although there was racial unity, there was no word for patriotism in the Chinese language and no conception of nationality among the people. We are told that many among the masses did not even hear the news of Japan's victory over China, and that many of those who did hear cared nothing about it. Yet to-day a burning patriotism is sweeping through the younger generation of China and rapidly extending even among the masses. The writer heard of many a student who had cut off a finger that he might, in his own blood, sign a petition to the throne for liberty. It was a strange sight to see student audiences in China with every cue gone, and with them the whole conservatism of the past 4,000 years suddenly cast away.

Whole audiences rose with intense feeling to sing their new national hymn to the same tune as that of several of the great nations of the West. The widespread demand for a republic and the recent change of government was a striking evidence of the new spirit of nationalism and patriotism that has pervaded the Chinese people, and so strong is the demand for it to-day that, despite local disturbances, democratic and republican government can probably never again be permanently overthrown in China.

A generation ago patriotism was almost unknown in corrupt Korea, but a strong national feeling is now everywhere manifested. In the Philippines, also, which showed almost no national consciousness under the Spanish Government, political autonomy is now insistently demanded, and the people are restive even under the most rapid advances in self-government which the United States can give them.

The same burning patriotism has spread among the students of India. Indeed, every student audience from Tokio to Calcutta, from Shanghai to Constantinople, from Seoul to Bombay, shows the same deep national feeling, the same response to the national note. The point of contact to-day with the students throughout Asia is to be found in this deep national consciousness. They are at first little interested in individual salvation; but to anything which concerns their nation and its welfare there is instant response.

The students of India to-dsy are not reading the Vedas or the musings of the ancient Rishis or speculative philosophy, but they are reading Mill and Mazzini on liberty, they are interested in the American and French revolutions and in England's struggle for liberty. This developing national consciousness, which is slowly but surely penetrating the masses, will probably, in time, bring India to the position of a great self-governing member of the British Empire, like Canada.

Follow European Lead.

Taking up the subject of the intellectual awakening of the Asiatic nations, Mr. Eddy writes that if is even more marked than the political, and to-day Asia is borrowing in her turn from Western education and Western science the same freedom of thought and the emancipation of the mind that Europe in the Renaissance drew from the Greek and Latin classics and the wisdom of the East. He says:

Within our own lifetime the Japanese have become a nation of readers. They claim to have more than ninety per cent. of their children of school-going age in their public schools. Japan issued more books, under new titles, last year than did either England or America, and her Era of Meiji, or Enlightenment, since 1868 has been a veritable renaissance.

China's intellectual awakening has been even more startling than that of Japan. Reference has been made to the Imperial Edict, which, a month after the signing of the Treaty of Portsmouth in 1905, swept away the ancient system of education and substituted a modern and Western system. China's scholars for 2,000 years had had their eyes steadily fixed on a golden age of the past. Although they had performed titanic feats in memorizing whole volumes of their ancient classics, they did not know that the earth was round, they knew nothing of gravitation or of practical affairs. But now China has begun her modern education in earnest. Temples in many of the cities have been confiscated to accommodate the colleges or schools which are being founded more rapidly than buildings can be built for them. The ancient examination halls of the classic system are being torn down to build the new universities and parliament buildings.

The number of modern Government students in Peking in a decade rose from 300 to 17,000, and the pupils in the province surrounding from 2,000 to 200,000. During a visit by the writer to a dozen cities in China he found from 4,000 to 12,000 students in each. The splendid buildings of the great normal schools rise in many cities, some having 1,000 teachers in training; for China's new system when completed will call for nearly a million teachers. There is a thirst for modern education greater even than that formerly manifested for the old learning, when men of 70 or 80 years of age were seen still trying to pass the classic examinations. Even women's education is being rapidly advanced in China.

The educational record of the Philippines also has been a brilliant one during a decade. In 1910-11 there were over 600,000 pupils in the schools, or more than one-quarter of the 2,000,000 children of school-going age. More than 500 American teachers were carried in one shipload to the Philippines. A splendid system of industrial training, including farming, domestic science, and practical handicrafts, is giving the Filipinos a much-needed industrial gospel. Education is free to all. Pupils have learned more English under a decade of American rule than Spanish in three centuries under the control of Spain. Approximately one-sixth of the entire revenue of the Government is spent for education.

The revival of learning and the thirst for education are equally manifest in India. Not only are there more than 30,000 students in the colleges and over 6,000,000 children in the schools of India, but the growing and insistent demand for free and compulsory primary education is being steadily voiced by Indian political leaders like Mr. Gokhale.

Some one may object that the masses are not yet educated in India or China and that four-fifths of the children in both countries are not as yet in school, that the farmers in the distant villages have not yet heard of the Indian Mutiny of 1857 or of Japan's victory over China; but it is equally true that the masses were not educated in the renaissance of Europe, and indeed often did not even know of the existence of the revival of learning.

The printing press is extending this Oriental renaissance much more rapidly than it did the Occidental. Although the Chinese invented movable type five centuries before Gutenberg at Mainz, it was Robert Morrison, the missionary, who brought the first modern press to China. Her one permitted newspaper, The Imperial Gazette, for the officials, is now multiplied more than two hundredfold. William Carey introduced the first printing press and newspaper into India, where to-day 3,500 newspapers and periodicals are issued from 2,700 presses.

One mission press in Shanghai is publishing 100,000,000 pages a year, and the Beirut press to date has turned out over a billion pages in the heart of the Mohammedan world. The half million copies of a single Gospel sold in Korea in a year would exceed the number of Bibles sold in all Europe during the first century of the Renaissance. The 4,000,000 Bibles, Testaments, and portions sold in China in a year would equal the number of Bibles in circulation in the entire world at the opening of the nineteenth century.

Mr. Eddy presents some very interesting facts concerning the economic awakening of Asia. He writes:

During the latter half of the nineteenth century the trade of India increased fourfold and that of China sixfold. The trade of the Philippines doubled in a decade of American rule, while that of Japan has increased sevenfold in the last twenty years.

But the twentieth century will see far greater developments in the East than the nineteenth did. The simple age of agriculture is giving way to one of industry; handicrafts to national commerce, and isolation to the new means of communication that are producing a national and international consciousness. The chimneys of the great factories of Osaka and Calcutta tower like those of Birmingham.

We traveled around the world on Japanese steamship lines, comfortable, highly efficient, and paying dividends, with their stock at a premium, while some of the American lines on the Pacific Ocean can scarcely pay expenses. Our Japanese steamer crossing the Pacific issued a daily paper, receiving news by wireless from Asia and America.

The trade of China will develop rapidly like that of Japan and will be of great significance to the West. A decade or two ago they were picking up old horseshoes in the streets of London and shipping them out to make third-rate plows for the farmers on the hills of Central China. To-day, digging under those hills in the four central provinces, they find the greatest coal fields in the world; enough in the Shansi Province alone to supply the world for over 1,000 years, according to the estimates of the German geologist, Baron von Richthofen. In Central China they have found iron ore better for casting than that of Pittsburgh.

In the great Hanyang Iron and Steel Works of Wuchang, across from Hankow—the Chicago of China—among its 4,000 workmen the writer saw skilled Chinese labor working at $1.25 a week, handling 13,000 horsepower machinery under electric control, and turning out the finest steel rails for the new railways of China, that will stretch from Shanghai on the east to India on the west, from Canton in the south to Siberia in the north.

An American steel man who was asked to open up iron works on the Pacific Coast declined to do so, saying that America could never compete with China on that coast. Even the American Steel Corporation, according to the testimony of Charles M. Schwab before the Senate Commission in 1912, finds it cheaper to-day in San Francisco to get pig iron from China than to haul its own iron from Pittsburgh.

China has vast natural resources. The former American Minister, the Hon. John W. Foster, said that China would build more railways than any other country in the world in the twentieth century. If her railways were developed until their gross returns were equal to those of the United States, these in one year would exceed China's present national debt (approximately $877,000,000.) She has vast resources in coal, having twenty times as much as the United Kingdom, and almost, if not quite, as much as the United States. Develop China's mines of all kinds until the output is of like value to those of the United States and it would exceed China's national debt every three months.

China has the largest laboring population in the world, the greatest supply of cheap, and potentially of skilled, labor of any nation. If her manufactures were developed until the gross returns were equal to those of America, these would equal the entire national debt in three weeks. Though retarded for a short time by the adjustment of her political difficulties, she will surely, though not slowly, develop these vast resources.

India's trade has increased in half a century from about $300,000,000 to $1,400,000,000, and stands at present first of all the countries in Asia. She needs, however, a protective tariff to develop her industries and save her population from an exclusive dependence upon agriculture in a land of drought and recurring famines.

Mr. Eddy has this to say about the unmistakable social awakening of Asia:

The development of a new social consciousness and the beginnings of a great movement for social service are among the most striking phenomena which the writer observed during the last seven months in India, China, and Japan. In Japan there is a steady advance of democracy and of the masses against the classes. The defense of the Constitution this year against the exclusive power of the Emperor and the Elder Statesmen was a marked triumph.

China, naturally democratic, has shown her ideals in the insistent demand for a republic. The striking social reforms which China has undertaken are evidence of a growing social consciousness. Her splendid fight against opium, deliberately facing a loss in revenue of $40,000,000, has put to shame the feeble efforts of timorous Western nations in their fight against the liquor traffic.

The gambling evil in Canton was abolished in the face of a loss of more than a million dollars in revenue. Foot binding has been prohibited by imperial edict, and some women with bound feet wear large shoes to give the impression of normal feet. The laws of judicial procedure have also been improved and torture abolished.

In India, too, a new social conscience and a growing movement for social reform are following in the train of Christian missions and of Western education. The sacredness of human life and the value of the individual are being taught, and a new social conscience is being manifested among the educated leaders in India to-day. A movement is now gaining ground even in Hinduism for the relief of the pariahs and outcasts and for the education of the poor.

According to Mr. Eddy, three words mark the progress of the Japanese in most matters—adopt, adapt, and adept. He writes:

The Japanese are still remarkably successful in imitation, adaptation, and real assimilation, but besides this they are also evincing considerable power of invention, as the Arisaka gun, the Shimose smokeless powder, and the Oda mechanical mine bear witness.

Social changes are quite evident under the new era. Infanticide and suicide are condemned. The place of woman has been exalted. She now has a recognized status, and a woman may now become the head of a family or inherit property. The very physique and stature of the Japanese has increased almost a full inch under the new era, according to scientific measurements taken in the schools and army. The treatment of criminals has been improved, humane laws of criminal procedure passed, torture prohibited, and asylums for the insane, the leper, and the blind have been opened. "A social conscience is being developed, and social service is now being undertaken on an increasing scale by the Japanese themselves.

Still Has Faults.

Do not think, however, that Japan has by any means arrived at a state near perfection, for Mr. Eddy shows that the very rapidity of her progress has proved in some respects detrimental to her people. He writes:

Japan has moved almost too quickly to success. Though her people have excelled as soldiers and sailors, in manufactures and commerce, in a dazzling external success, the heart of the nation is far behind the outward development, and may be said to be living still under the spell of the middle ages. In morals, in social uplift, in truth, and in chastity Japan's advance has not been so rapid as in other directions. Even economically she is not altogether prosperous. Her industries are crippled by the unfortunate absence of iron in the country, lack of skilled labor, and the predominance of female labor.

Her debt now amounts to $1,325,000,000, an increase of $1,050,000,000 over her debt prior to the Russian war. The taxes have more than doubled since the war, and are now $165,000,000, an average of about 30 per cent. upon the income of business men and property holders.

The country is far too poor to undertake a war to-day, save in self-defense. Japan's wealth is about one-fourteenth that of the United States, while her debt is fourteen times as heavy and the average income per capita is only $30 a year, or about one-fifth that of the United States. Japan's water power and a few mines are her only large undeveloped resources.

READING THE CONSTITUTION IN THE SQUARE AT MONASTIR

CLERGYMEN GROW ANECDOTAL

ELEVEN hundred prominent churchmen sat at dinner in the great red dining room of one of our famous hotels. Dogmatics and theology accompanied the soup and fish, but as the food grew heavier the talk grew lighter, and presently the huge room was filled with the hum of voices, and laughter echoed and re-echoed from every table. Whether a man be Bishop, Dean, priest, or layman, he is always a man; and, after the tense days of formal convocation, it was quite natural that the reverend gentlemen refused longer to "talk shop."

Soon impromptu speeches were in order, and, needless to say, the petty follies and foibles of the cloth came in for the lion's share of badinage.

Finally, there arose a long and lugubrious gentleman, sharp of face and keen of eye, his lanky and angular figure encased in a clerical dinner coat that fitted so excessively well that it failed to conceal the sharp projections of the episcopal collarbones. Well known this clergyman evidently was, however, for his appearance was the signal for a rattle of enthusiastic applause.

"When I was a young curate in one of our Northwestern States," drawled the speaker, "I was exceedingly proud of my newly acquired naturalization as an American citizen. Late in the month of June I wrote an exuberant letter to my father, who was at that time the Bishop of a well-known Canadian diocese, asking him to take a vacation over the Fourth of July and come to see me."

"'That was the day we licked you,' I added vainglioriously. On the morning of the Fourth I received the following brief and pointed note:

"'I could not attend to my duties were I to take a vacation on the anniversary of the days that I licked you.'"

When the laughter had subsided there arose immediately a demand for another story. The popular speaker patted his long black hair as he looked about him and said:

"A small cathedral mission sent word to its Dean that a preacher was urgently desired for the following Sunday. 'And we wish an extemporaneous speaker,' the request concluded.

"Accordingly, a young and very green curate was dispatched to the mission. About the middle of the next week an old countryman called upon the Dean and expressed a desire for another preacher, adding: 'Not the one that came last week.'

"'Why,' objected the dean, "wasn't the Rev. Mr. Smith an extemporaneous speaker?"

"I dunno," retorted the elderly deacon, "I dunno. That speech o' his might a been called extemporaneous; but we all called it 'rural free delivery.'"

STORY WRITERS AND SMOKING

A WHIMSICAL fate having seen fit to throw me much into the society of writers of fiction," remarked the Keen Observer, "I have had many opportunities of observing those intellectual workers when they are off their guard.

"For myself I do not pretend to be gifted or cursed with a Temperament, and some of the little ways of my friends used to puzzle me when I was younger. I thought they were posing. Later on, however, I realized that they were the slaves of a sort of auto-suggestion, which led them to attach great importance to things or conditions ignored by ordinary mortals.

"The story writer, it seems, is always trying to create the atmosphere that will help him to work out his ideas, and in this tobacco plays a large part.

"There is one pen-chaser who eats at the little restaurant on the east side that I have frequented for years. He always carries two pipes around with him. One of them is an ordinary pipe, reasonably clean, and he smokes it in an unaffected manner. The second is a venerable briar, blackened and hardened by constant use, and almost unbelievably rank. This offense against the nostrils of his friends he produces upon occasions and puffs upon with a meditative air. At such times he will not speak to you if you address him; he is working out a plot.

"I once asked him to define the virtue of his old pipe. He told me quite naturally and simply that it was the first he had ever owned. He had bought it when he was only a lad, and it had been his companion through many vicissitudes. He had noticed in those days that to fill it with his favorite mixture and light it was to invite inspiration.

"Furthermore, it was evidently a talisman, as it could not be lost or broken. He had dropped it once on a tramping trip, but on retracing his steps several hours later to look for it he had found it without difficulty. It had been stolen from him and mysteriously returned. He had dropped it overboard in Long Island Sound, but a wave had washed it back against the boat and he had recovered it. He did not pretend to explain just why it was so, but the pipe was undoubtedly a part of his literary life.

"I know another writer who is now dead, who had an even more peculiar notion in connection with smoking. He was subject to melancholy and taciturn moods, and at such times he would invariably slip away and hide himself from his friends in the back room of some obscure water-front saloon.

"He would order a glass of beer and produce from his pocket four or five boxes of cork-tipped cigarettes. As soon as he had finished smoking the first he would light another from the butt and carefully stand the latter on its cork end on the table. He would keep this up all the evening until the table was covered with butts, at which he would stare gloomily, and he would show the greatest possible irritation if any of them fell down. The onlookers thought him crazy, but it was at these times that he worked out the plots of the brilliant and original tales that made him famous."

ART AT HOME AND ABROAD

Sixty of Lawrence's Drawings Will Be Exhibited During This Week at the Scott and Fowles Galleries.

THE collection of sixty drawings by Sir Thomas Lawrence to be placed on view this week at the Scott and Fowles Galleries have more than the usual interest attaching to the drawings of the masters. Lawrence depended to an extraordinary degree upon the freshness of the first idea. His mind was not deeply enlisted by the problems of his art, and the prettiness of a pretty face too often was permitted to suffice. But he had an unmistakable touch of genius. It found expression in the post-haste portrait of Miss Farren, where he saw the right thing to do, and instantly did it, and it finds expression in many of these charming memoranda in which he catches the most distinctive characteristic of his sitter and places it on paper with an easy and adequate touch. He has understood his material and kept close to his model. Even in the drawings one sees, however, that he could not altogether get free from his interest in details. In his study for his picture of Homer, for example, he quite gives away the fact that he depended upon the expression of the features rather than upon the nobility of the gesture to denote the grandeur of his subject. But there are instances in which he is one of the most exquisite of draughtsmen. The little half-length of Lady Betty Foster, for example; nothing could be more feathery light in touch, more winning in presentation, more dainty and sprightly and tender, than this curled and powdered lady in her plumed hat. The drawing of Miss Farren, also, rather blind of one eye though it is, gives an impression of a more truthful rendering of the lady's Celtic impetuosity than that gained from the very beautiful painting. And the study of his sister, Miss Anne Lawrence, done when the artist was only 12 years old, how completely it justifies all the printed accounts of his precocity. Perhaps the most beautiful drawing in the group is the sketch of Lady Hamilton, with its richness of shadow and vivacity of line. He wrote concerning his first opportunity to see Romney's favorite model: "I hear it is the most gratifying thing to the painter's eye that can be, and I am frightened at the same time with the intimation that she will soon be Lady Hamilton, and that I may get no other opportunity."

"Lady Bagot, Viscountess Burgherch, and Lady Fitzroy Somerset," from a Drawing by Sir Thomas Lawrence.

The catalogue printed in London when the collection was shown there gives many entertaining details of the famous sitters. There is the portrait of Miss Sarah Siddons, handsome and merry, whose history throws a not too flattering light on the artist's temperament and character. It is related that he fell in love with her and had "arrived at an understanding" with her, when suddenly he found himself in love with her sister Maria. Sarah was very good humored about it, and so were the rest of the family, and he became engaged to Maria. But now that he had his way it no longer was quite what he wanted, and Sarah really had been extremely charming. He decided that he had been right in the first place, that it was Sarah whom he loved. The unfortunate Maria died, although not from blighted hope, and on her deathbed she made her sister promise not to marry Lawrence. Both seemed finally to recognize the weakness of his character, and his inability to feel a long sustained passion for one person.

The sketch entitled "Mary Baker (Carabu Princess of Javasu)" recalls the picturesque history of the model, which runs as follows:

"On the 3d April, 1817, a young woman made her appearance at a cottage near Knole Park, Gloucestershire, and made signs that she wanted to sleep there. She was dressed poorly, but quaintly, with a sort of turban around her head. Neither the cottagers nor the overseer to whom she applied were able to understand her language, so she was taken to Knole Park, where she was entertained by Mr. and Mrs. James Worral, who lived there. For some time her nationality remained a mystery. She would touch neither animal food nor intoxicants, and lived chiefly on boiled rice, water, and tea. Presently a gentleman who had traveled in the East Indies was brought to her, and by his knowledge of Eastern tongues, eked out with signs, he managed to obtain the following particulars of her origin. She was Carabu Princess of Javasu, and had been kidnapped by pirates. She was sold as a slave, and, after many adventures, managed to escape to England. Once her identity was known the Princess became the rage, and held a kind of court at Bath. Artists painted her, and the English Foreign Office was appealed to to restore her to her native country. Her notoriety proved the undoing of the Princess, for she was recognized, not as a high-born foreigner, but as Mary Baker, a native of Devon and an ex-servant girl who had run away from her place, and, after various vicissitudes, adopted the rôle in which she achieved her notoriety. Mr. Worral paid for her passage to America, in the hopes that a situation for her might be obtained in Philadelphia. Of her subsequent career nothing is known.

Many other quaint tales might be connected with the drawings, since Lawrence entertained all fashionable London and a fair proportion of those distinguished outside the merely fashionable world. His courtly pencil flattered right and left, and possibly he took care that not even his first impressions should be other than complimentary, but at least we see life as he saw it, through rose-colored spectacles.

Etchings by Muirhead Bone.

Etchings by Muirhead Bone and D. Y. Cameron are at the Kraushaar Galleries until Nov. 27. Mr. Cameron's include the beautiful "Dinnet Moor" and "The Boddin" of last year. Mr. Bone's are newer to our public, and have a quality of thoroughness that works out in the later examples toward breadth and delicacy. The "Dry Dock, Glasgow," is crowded with detail that has been observed with a vision unconfused and scrupulous, but that hardly promises the subtler beauty of "Stirling Castle," in which the light lies softly over building and landscape, obliterating all harshness of angle and outline. In the same galleries is a "Normandy Mother and Child," a sculpture by Alphonse Legros, realistically yet nobly modeled, and a far finer performance than the larger number of his works in oil or his etchings.

Another exhibition of etchings by Muirhead Bone opens to-morrow at the galleries of the Arthur H. Hahlo Company. In the introduction to the catalogue Campbell Dodgson, Chief of the Print Department of the British Museum, discusses the artist's career at length and concludes with the following expression of preference:

"If I were asked which of all my Bones I should cling to, were all but one to be surrendered, I should answer Ayr Prison. The highest qualities of Bone's work at its best, in landscape and in architecture, are there combined. It is planned with an exquisite feeling for line and balance and wrought with a masterly technique. I hardly think it rash to place Ayr Prison already among the classics of etching."

Etchings by Earl H. Reed.

At the Galleries of the Brown-Robertson Company is an exhibition of etchings by Earl H. Reed, the first collected group of his work in this kind to be seen in New York. Mr. Reed turns like a true artist to the material at his door and has used the shores of Lake Michigan as the scene of his labors. The dunes and their sparse grasses, the birds, and wide skies of the lakeside afford abundantly poetic themes for the most exacting imagination, and the etchings give to a remarkable degree the sense of the wind sweeping across the open spaces, fretting the trees and grasses, and sending the clouds in swift flight across the heavens. The spirit of place has fully possessed the artist, a rare quality in art, and especially in graphic art.

Another Academy at Rome.

The Giornale d'Italia in its issue of Oct. 25 comments on the proposed establishment of another "Academy" at Rome. It says:

"The newspapers announce that the President of the Russian Academy of Fine Arts has bought, or at least has come to Rome for the purpose of buying, the Villa Aldebrandini. This purchase has been made, or will be made, to organize in Rome an academy of young artists on the model of the French Academy at the Villa Medici, and the Spanish Academy at San Pietro, in Montorio. This news has been received with great joy, first of all because it definitely assures the salvation of the beautiful Roman villa always threatened, if not with destruction, at least with radical transformation, and, in the second place, because it is another proof that Rome is recovering the primacy in artistic studies which she had gradually lost during the last fifty years. Rome is becoming once again a great centre of studies. Up to a short time ago the French Republic and the Spanish monarchy were the only countries which possessed organized and official institutions. The other nations, in so far as they sent a few students to Rome, sent them privately and without direct control. But in these last few years private individuals and governments have been looking to it that each nation should have, as it were, its own Villa Medici. England, uniting in one institution its School of Art and its Institute of Archaeology, has commenced the construction of a veritable palace at the Valle Giulia, where in a short time young students of British nationality will find the very largest hospitality. Germany has transformed the Villa Massimo on the Via Nomentana into a fascinating hermitage for its artists. The United States of America, taking as its centre a marvelous villa overlooking the Porta San Pancrazio, is erecting a veritable village of archaeologists, painters, sculptors, and musicians. And the Russian Government, the latest arrival, has secured for itself the last of the great villas within the city which has as yet escaped destruction, and is organizing there its future academy. But that is not all. We learn that the Argentine Republic, which already has its scholars in the City of Rome, has manifested the intention of creating a similar institution, and the example of this great South American State will surely be followed by its sister republics."

American Sculpture.

At the Gorham Galleries there will be until Nov. 29 an exhibition of sculpture by American artists which contains some remarkable pieces, and puts our sculpture on a higher level in the estimation of experienced connoisseurs than it ever before has attained. It is not so much that a large proportion of superlatively good work exists—probably a large proportion of superlatively good work never exists anywhere—but our young artists have become inspirited and alive to the technical joys of their craft to an extent certainly unknown in the days of the Greek Slave and for long after. There are, moreover, a number of interesting conceptions, quite fresh because so old and so ripe for revision by the modern mind. These Pompeiian things by Paul Manship, they are hauntingly ancient yet brilliantly of to-day. A half-nude girl dances a child on her knee after a fashion known all over the world and in all countries, no doubt. And it is just here that the charm works—age-old childishness and playfulness and the kindness of youth to youth illustrated in the theme, an excellently severe spirit of design, and a wholly modern note of picturesqueness and sprightly lack of sentimentality in the treatment of the detail. Chester Beach moves out of the danger zone in which "l'art nouveau" had its birth, and exercises his thoroughly vital talent with health and freedom. Edith W. Burroughs is feminine in the finest sense of the word. Her "Fortune," a little figure poised on its wheel, how filled it is with the dainty refinement and lightness associated with the feminine type, how scrupulous it is in workmanship, and how suggestive of that inner force which ever since the world began has enabled "representative women" to venture in fields of spiritual hardship and peril without revealing their natural shrinkings. One does not often encounter a more charming bit of small sculpture than this "Fortune," or the more enticing "Fenella." Miss St. Eberle is another woman exhibiting, but is not represented by her best work. The contrary is true of Mrs. Hyatt, whose jaguar climbing down a rock is quite the best bit of anatomical construction that she has done. Mahonri Young's "Piper" reveals more clearly than his themes from labor the fact that he has not yet fully mastered the facts of his case, and cannot yet construct a figure in which you can be perfectly sure of that coherence of all the parts so necessary to one's ease of mind when looking at representations of human beings engaged in feats of strength. Paul Bartlett's "Franklin" is a version of the famous philosopher that neither flatters his mental equipment nor presents him as commonplace, and it is a remarkably happy pose for the capital old poseur. Cartaino Scarpetta has moved a long way since he did his little Tolstoi. His portrait group of Gaspar, Daphne, and Foster Hodgson has excellent qualities, of which the best is simplicity. The other exhibitors, most of whom are well represented, are Robert Aitken, Benjamin Bufano, Frederick B. Clark, James Earl Fraser, Carl A. Heber, Albert Jaegers, (with a bull group for the Panama Exposition;) Sherry E. Fry, Isidor Konti, Augustus Lukeman, A. Phimister Proctor, C. S. Pietro, Willard Dryden Paddock, Sigurd Niandros, A. A. Weinman, Victor D. Salviati, Edmund D. Quinn, Frederick G. R. Roth, L. F. Scholtz, Arthur Lee, Bela L. Pratt, Bessie Potter Vonnoh, C. C. Rumsey, Victor D. Brenner, Gigilo, and Laura Gardin.

Lady in Blue, by Hamilton Easter Field.

Painting by Hamilton Easter Field.

Hamilton Easter Field is showing his recent paintings at 104 Columbia Heights, Brooklyn, together with some very interesting carved woodwork by Mr. Laurent. Mr. Field has not yet lost the happy sense of responsibility to his inspiration which marks the amateur and is apt to evaporate with long professional service. Some of his work is technically quite deficient, but the remainder has a peculiar beauty, a kind of technical innocence, that is much too rare not to be welcomed with enthusiasm. In each case he seems to have tried for truly great results, and while of course his reach exceeds his grasp, there is nothing to lament in the high aim.

His figure in red against an oak panelling has strong qualities. The expression is ever so little strained toward violence, but the simplicity of the modeling lends dignity to the whole composition. A gypsy figure, "Romany Chi," is plastic in feeling, with a little confusion of lights and half tones on the face, due, perhaps, to the unfortunate emergence of the underpainting.

Then there is a portrait entitled "Miss Rowe," which reaches the high-water mark of the painter's achievement thus far. The face is painted solidly and with great directness, although there has been paint put on top of paint, with the first painting left somewhat tacky, a condition usually avoided by the artist who seeks the easiest way, but one which Mr. Field has turned to excellent effect. There is a peculiar richness of flesh-like quality, indeed, in this tawny face with its snapping eyes and crown of jet black hair. The figure also is modelled with perfect simplicity, its slightly clumsy bulk and the large embracing contour lending an Egyptian solidity to the whole aspect.

Mr. Laurent's wood-carving is based on a panel of eighteenth-century work brought from Madagascar, and is extremely ingenious as to invention, and clever in execution. Mr. Field has painted an African subject, which is set as a panel in a framework of this carving, and in which he humorously shows the woodworker in the background quite bowled over by his theme.

Chinese Art.

At the Montrose Galleries Mr. A. W. Bahr is again showing ancient Chinese paintings a few of which he gives to the Sung dynasty, the others to the Yuan, Ming, and Ching dynasties. Nothing further back than the Sung dynasty would be easily authenticated. Tang paintings just preceding the Sung period are rare enough, and paintings of the pre-Tang period are so seldom found that a writer in Kokka says "we are unable to comment upon them except as they are described in ancient records." It is obvious, then, that Mr. Bahr is taking us as far back as may be expected with any show of reason, and for the majority of gallery visitors these austere portaits of an Arhat and a Scholar are sufficiently ancient to ask for a slight readjustment of the mind for purposes of appreciation. Portraits of Arhats were as numerous in the Sung and Ming dynasties as were portraits of saints with the European Primitives, and most of them wore a look of conventional likeness to one another. In the Ashikaga era the art of painting was confined to the clerical class and Buddhistic influence naturally prevailed, giving to the art of that period at least a decided religious tendency. The collection contains many "Buddhistic studies," most of them dating from the Yuan dynasty, and from the same dynasty comes a painting of a white stag which is superb in that quality of realism which is as far as possible from the crass naturalism of the imitative painters. A Japanese critic has put the case for the restrained style of Chinese painting convincingly: "The reason why Oriental painters avoid making their works too close to nature, and instead adopt a style characterized by economized strokes and suggestiveness, is simply a desire to leave room for the exercise of the imaginative powers on the part of those who examine their works."

Mr. Bahr's exhibition also includes some rare specimens of the early glazed pottery and a few ancient bronzes, marble, and stone sculptures. Perhaps it is caviar to the general, but it is highly rewarding to the particular.

Paintings by Allen Tucker.

The work of Allen Tucker now on view at the Folsom Galleries may possibly be disconcerting to a public that has feasted on old masters and turned resolutely away from new schools. Mr. Tucker is so emphatically a young master, whatever his age in years may be, and has at the end of his brush so many frank young truths to tell us, that unless we are patient oldsters and eager in our doddering way to keep up with the strong-limbed procession that is getting along with rapid strides, we shall find his voice a trifle too positive, his accent a trifle too punctilious, his vision a trifle too adequate and hard. But his work has life, abounding life, and shows also a resolute effort toward independence. He avoids the leaning back on the experience of others which is the wicked way of those who would be at once modern and safe. Looking at "The Orange Book," one says: "How much distinction to come from a scheme so childlike!" The "Pattern in Black," again, succeeds in being both obvious and beautiful. That is real strength. When a painter resorts to subtlety at the outset and covers his indirection by dainty bewilderments of technique, there is a kind of uncertainty about his future that gives a conscientious commentator pause. But when, as in the case of Mr. Tucker, an artist uses chromatic opposites with so much feeling for balance as to give the impression of moderate and tempered relation, when, in a word, the art of design has been so thoroughly learned as to permit bold experiment without an effect of crudity, we may be fairly sure that good will lead through better up toward best. Mr. Tucker has an extraordinary feeling for color and a sense of style. With that much equipment the young masters of the Renaissance went very far, very far indeed.

Small Exhibitions.

As the season advances the smaller exhibitions crowd upon one another's heels in the usual fashion. At the gallery of the Photo-Secession A. Walkowitz is showing his recent drawings, pastels and water colors; at the Powell Art Gallery the sixth annual exhibition of Thumb Box Sketches to be held at those rooms is open until the 15th of December; Fred S. Burgy shows his oil and water color paintings at the Clubhouse of the Arion Society until Nov. 26th; an exhibition of paintings by Arthur R. Freedlander is at St. Marks-in-the-Bouwerie. At the Century Association gallery is an exhibition of recent marine paintings by Howard Russell Butler, to which visitors are admitted by card only. Paintings by Robert Wacik of Prague, pastels by Louis Weinberg and sculpture by Joseph Krupka are on view in the rooms of the Picturecraft Company until Nov. 30. On Nov. 24 Ernest Peixotto's drawings from scenes along the west coast of South Africa will be placed in the gallery at the rear of the new Scribner Bookstore, to be on view until Nov. 29. In Amsterdam Frederick Muller & Co. will sell this week paintings from several estates comprising a number of very beautiful examples of old and modern work by Dutch artists, and a "Virgin and Child" by Montagna.

At the Van Cortlandt Museum there will be a historic and old family portrait loan exhibit for two months. It is free every day from 10 to 5 o'clock except Thursday, when 25 cents includes tea in the old colonial kitchen.

THE CONSTITUTION

Prof. Beard's Startling Theory as to Influences Affecting Origin of That Famous Document

AN ECONOMIC INTERPRETATION OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES. By Charles A. Beard, Associate Professor of Politics in Columbia University. New York: The Macmillan Company. $2.25.

THE orthodox view of the Constitution is that it was draughted under the influence of the French Revolution, and was designed to safeguard liberty, equality, and fraternity above all else. But now comes Prof. Beard with a novel view, which he supports by original documents hitherto unknown, or at least too little known. He has gone to the records of 1783-1787 for an actual rather than a theoretical account of what was done, and he has supported that by an examination of the personal records of the Fathers. In this prosaic, unconventional way he has learned that the revered Fathers were no better than they should have been, and drew up the famous document with very precise and little obscured objects in view. The inspiration of the Governmental masterpiece was the remedying of prejudice to property under the Articles of Confederation. Manufactures, trade, shipping, financial interests had suffered, and these four groups combined to advance their own interests. No vote was taken, and there was no popular mandate for calling the convention which draughted the Constitution. Therefore the propertyless masses were unrepresented. On the other hand the members of the Convention were, with few exceptions, "personally interested in, and derived economic advantages from, the establishment of the new system." Essentially the Constitution is an economic document based upon the concept that the fundamental private rights of property are exterior to government, and morally beyond the reach of majorities. The records show that the majority of the Convention recognized the claim of property to a special position of favor under the Constitution, and not more than one-sixth of the electorate had even an indirect opportunity to express themselves upon the form of government under which they and we have lived for a century. The leaders who supported the Constitution in the ratifying conventions represented the same economic groups as the draughtsmen, and in many cases their personal interests were the same. In the votes of ratification there was a well-defined cleavage between personalty interest on the one hand and small farming and debtor interests on the other. The Constitution was not inspired by or adopted by the whole people, neither was it created by "the States." It was the work of a consolidated group of interests which preferred themselves to either the people or the States. For the same reason the inspiration was truly national in the sense that State boundaries were neglected and local interests were not thought of.

Not less unconventional is the view of the Constitution makers personally. There were speculators in those days as well as this, of course, for speculation knows neither time nor seasons. And here is the record of their dabbling in land warrants and scrip and the other counters of that time. Hamilton was accused of criminal acts and was under suspicion of defaulting. "The land speculators and promoters embraced all the leading men of the time—Washington, Franklin, Robert Morris, James Wilson, William Blount, and other men of eminence." This is not idle gossip. Names, dates, amounts, and the nature of the operations are cited from the records and cannot be doubted, whether or not it be admitted that these interests colored the Constitution. Prof. Beard is not concerned to paint the matter in dark colors. Rather he explains and exculpates. The Constitution could not have been adopted unless these interests supported it. Hamilton deliberately set himself to insure their support by an explicit appeal to their selfishness. The Fathers understood perfectly the effect of the adoption of the Constitution upon the depreciated Continental securities, of which there were some $60,000,000 afloat, and upon the value of the land beyond the Alleghanies in which they operated without uniform success, but with an effect upon their deliberations which it is less difficult to imagine than to explain away. These facts acquire additional and timely interest in view of the attacks now being made upon the Constitution because it is the defense of vested interests contrary to the rights of man. The Constitution placed the dollar above the man, and now man is being placed above the dollar. Social morality is sounder in our times than in the times of the Fathers. Students of constitutional history and lovers of scandal can alike find much in Prof. Beard's laborious researches and luminous exposition.

ESSAYS AND APHORISMS.

Wit and Sound Common Sense in Humphrey J. Desmond's Volume of Impressions.

THE LARGER VALUES MAKE FOR THE WELL ROUNDED LIFE. By Humphrey J. Desmond, author of "Little Uplifts," &c. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co. Price 50 cents.

By Maurice Francis Egan,
U. S. Minister to Denmark.

THE word "essay" for many years became a word of fear to the average reader, but it is the average reader who needs, more than any other person, the stimulus which a vital essay gives to his own thought. The aphorism so popular in the France of Rochefoucauld and Vauvenargues has quite gone out of fashion, unless it is carried as the point of a humorous story. Mr. Desmond has discovered that the public will read what may be called a cross—in the Burbank sense—between the essay and the aphorism, hence the enormous popularity of his "Little Uplifts." "The Larger Values" is an improvement on that little book of essential statements. There is hardly an essay in this little red volume that covers more than half a page. Mr. Desmond's power of acute observation and his gift of shrewd tolerance give unusual value to his impressions of life.

For instance, by a comparison of the English "Who's Who" with the American "Who's Who," he discovers that while the Englishman looks on outdoor sport or even outdoor walks as part of his life, the American does not consider either walks or sports important enough to be mentioned in his biography. He becomes enthusiastic over an Englishman who, in "Who's Who," reports that his favorite recreation is "idling—preferably with children." "That man," Mr. Desmond says, "will keep young."

He is of the opinion too, that our newspapers should be taken up only after breakfast, because he thinks the frightful accounts of lurid happenings disturb the appetite. He wishes that there could be some chronicle which would tell us only of golden deeds. Mr. Desmond, however, does not predict a large circulation for such a newspaper. "Such a chronicle," he adds, "would be a tonic against a sort of pessimism that often outcrops in an emotional narrowness."

Of the traditional ideas about Sabbath-breaking Mr. Desmond has something to say, indirectly:

> "Why, Jimmy! Did you kill a snake on Sunday?" "Yes'm, it was trying to bite me on Sunday."

"If Dives were wiser in his generation," Mr. Desmond comments, "he would not have endeavored to meet social problems by intrenching the rights of property in constitutions and ethics, for he would look to the future of his grandchildren, because, in our country, it only takes three generations from shirt sleeves to shirt sleeves."

There is a note of pessimism in one of Mr. Desmond's own conclusions, when he says:

> We must build on security and stability, on conditions rather than on law and reverence and even religion, much as these latter may aid for peace, justice, and order when the conditions are not too unfair.

Only an American with a clear outlook and a sure eye and a kind heart could have written "The Larger Values." Its brevity adds effect to its wit—I use "wit" in the sense in which Pope used it—for Mr. Desmond is a compound of a certain brilliancy and insight which may be called wisdom.

LIFE AFTER DEATH

Maeterlinck's Analysis of Theories That Attempt to Solve the Problem of Human Immortality

OUR ETERNITY. by Maurice Maeterlinck. Translated by Alexander Teixeira De Mattos. Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.50 net.

LIFE AND WRITINGS OF MAURICE MAETERLINCK. By Jethro Bithell. Charles Scribner's Sons.

WITHOUT attempting a cheap paradox one may say of Maeterlinck's volume, "Our Eternity," that its scope is its limitation; that in setting himself the task of examining all existing theories of survival, he presents so eloquently and cogently the arguments of each and balances with such nicety of adjustment their conflicting theories that one is almost persuaded to accept what the author wishes him to repudiate. Not Hudibras himself could change hands and confute his own arguments more skilfully than Maeterlinck develops some theory only to refute it, or rather to eliminate it from the series of hypotheses to which, one after another, he addresses himself. Now this judicial balancing would appear to be the broadest and sanest of methods, and certainly it could not be termed a limitation were it not for the fact that in this synthesis, this composite of all theories presented with equal cogency, Maeterlinck gives so little hint of his own conviction.

Doubtless the best service of philosophic speculation is to lead one to make his own deductions, but most readers who approach "Our Eternity" will already have made their deductions from the same premises. For these are not new theories—reincarnation, spiritualism, annihilation, conscious or unconscious survival—every thinking person has pondered "about them and about," until all the arguments, as Maeterlinck states them, fall into familiar grooves of the mind. It is valuable, then, to restate them only with some personal conviction, some well-crystallized conclusion that shall be the justification for approaching them at all; and while it would be a delight to read "Our Eternity" for the magic of the language, for the wonderful plays of argument, for the illumination which it throws upon all theories of survival—one finds himself wishing that the elimination of untenable theories had been more decisive, that, in a word, one had a more concrete expression of Maeterlinck's own opinion. The same need was felt lately when Sir Oliver Lodge put forth his long-anticipated statement upon immortality. So guarded was the utterance, so qualified and hedged about, that one turned from it with a sense of futility that, after all, so little had been gained; that on the utmost verge of thought one could still see this tiny flame of life flickering in the wind from the void.

This is precisely where "Our Eternity" leaves us, after carrying us along many roads whereon, for the moment, we felt that we walked securely. It is not, as with Sir Oliver Lodge, however, the theory of survival itself upon which Maeterlinck expends his reasoning; of survival he is well assured. It is rather the question of eternal moment, "Shall we carry with us our conscious identity?" that engages him and to answer which he examines in turn all hypotheses.

We demand that the ego shall know its transformations and be conscious of itself in its new environment, whether it merge into the vast energy of the universe or be reborn on other planes. But we base this desire upon the faculty of memory, upon the assumption that we may carry into the infinite the conscious knowledge of those events that have gone to the making of our individuality. Now memory, as Maeterlinck points out, is the most transient of faculties, since in this life the ego transforms a thousand times and loses the keen zest of personality which accompanied each state. Why should we wish in the next stage of our progress to retain the emotions and desires of this stage, more than we should wish to return to childhood and carry its emotions and personality into adult life? And even though we took into infinity the carefully hoarded memories of this life would they not quickly be dissipated by the impact of vaster impressions? If we admit that the ego persists, to make an abstract of Maeterlinck's reasoning, we must admit that it has always existed, since we can no more conceive a beginning than an end, and if it has existed it has already gone through infinite transformations of which it carries no conscious memory, one series of experiences after another being transformed into effects without any sense of loss, sorrow or defect through the absence of memory of these states. One looks from a very small angle upon infinity, then, when he demands that he shall carry with him the conscious knowledge of this particular phase of his existence which may well be one of the most obscure.

All this would seem to point to an acceptance of theosophy on the part of Maeterlinck, but while he gives two chapters of the book to a discussion of theosophy and reincarnation in all its history, and acknowledges that of all religious theories of survival "reincarnation is the most plausible and least repellant to our senses," yet he is not a theosophist and is by no means certain that the series of existences that the ego must already have known have been in what we should term mortal reincarnations. He devotes much space, however, to the experiments of the savant De Rochas in carrying a hypnotized subject back through what purport to be successive lives. De Rochas's experiments are among the most startling in the history of hypnosis and if accepted would incontestably prove reincarnation. By a series of downward passes the subject—in the case cited by Maeterlinck a young woman—is made to retrace her life, assuming at each stage the character and mentality consistent with the period. In other words, the hypnotized subject retraces the entire range of her sub-conscious memory and manifests outwardly all effects of its events, even to illness. Thus far we are on firm ground, but it is not firm ground when the subject, by means of further passes, retreats into the silence and darkness of the pre-natal period and emerges in a new identity, that of a querulous old man who in turn is made to retrace his life, giving through the voice of the hypnotized subject all details of his own existence, until he too comes to the pre-natal silence and darkness and emerges in the character of a woman with her own story to tell.

This would appear like the veriest chicanery, but De Rochas has taken not one but many subjects back through these revelations of former identity, with scientists investigating and eliminating all apparent avenues of fraud, and Maeterlinck admits that the experiments have been so conducted that fraud may probably be left out of the question. What one must reckon with, however, is the mysterious and powerful force of suggestion, and while the experimenter claims to have eliminated this in all conscious ways and even that scientists have attempted to confuse the hypnotized subject by counter-suggestion, to test what part this might play in the phenomena, De Rochas insists that the subject could not be diverted from the recital nor made to assume a new rôle. Unconscious suggestion, however, remains as a possible solution of all these and similar phenomena; the part that one mind, at whatever distance, may be playing in influencing another mind, in brief, what appear to be the subtle and inexhaustible powers of the sub-conscious, remain to be understood and resolved into laws before one is justified in accepting a super-normal theory. While confessing the phenomena to be inexplicable and reincarnation, to which they point, as beneficent and desirable, it is at best, as Maeterlinck suggests, capable of accounting for our manifest lives, not of exploring the ultimate and unmanifest.

Quite as searchingly he invades the spiritualistic realm and addresses himself to its hypothesis, going at length into the investigations of the Society for Psychical Research in the light they may shed upon conscious survival, and, while he welcomes these phenomena as an attempt to win another frontier, they are chiefly discredited by the triviality of what they purport to bring us. Surely spirits do not dignify the state to which we go, when intent only to identify themselves by some familiar, even puerile, event whose knowledge must be in the mind of some living person. If we accept them as pale reflections of the ego in the human state, retaining for a little time the earth memory ere they are withdrawn to incommunicable regions, the question still comes back to the pragmatic test where William James himself might have brought it. What benefit have we from this reputed connection of the carnate and discarnate; what exact and workable knowledge have we gained from it; how much more assurance have we to face the unknown? For, as Maeterlinck points out, we retain one survival of barbarity, the primitive terror of death, and, while one cannot agree that we stand in this regard where we stood a thousand years ago, since one can recall in a few years a great change in the attitude toward death, yet it looms and probably will loom to the end as the veiled dread, the one foe whose vigor is never lifted.

After examining all these hypotheses with infinite nicety of discussion, Maeterlinck returns to the two most tenable theories of survival—that where the ego persists with a modified consciousness, some link relating it to its new state so that it has a sense, however vague, that it persists in its own identity, and that of the ego losing its own conscious life in that of the cosmic consciousness. The latter is manifestly what Maeterlinck regards as the only adequate infinity, but it is to be regretted that he does not define more lucidly his conception of this same cosmic consciousness. No term was ever vaguer nor more convenient as an escape into the very haze which "Our Eternity" is intended to illumine. Philosophers before Maeterlinck have used this term as a vast generality, but it is only to explain with the inexplicable. Certainly in the last assize it must remain inexplicable, since we are dealing with speculation, but, as Maeterlinck himself declares, we win our right to larger infinities by our ability to conceive them, by the adventure of the mind in its attempt to surprise a vaster secret. Should he not, then, crystallize more exactly his theory of the cosmic consciousness? Is it synonymous with the spirit that works through evolution; is it realizing its own identity through the infinity of time; do we co-operate with it as a consciousness within a consciousness, knowing our part, or are we reabsorbed in it, as in the Buddhist Nirvana? We cannot but demand something more definite, some clue to this vaster speculation to which we must address ourselves, from this book otherwise so profound and beautiful, so luminous with the wonder of the spirit.

***

One opens with some misgiving the "Life of Maurice Maeterlinck," by Jethro Bithell, persuaded in advance that biographies written during the life of the subject must necessarily lack that savor of personality, that charm of setting that belongs only to a complete retrospect; but Mr. Bithell speedily proves this a mistake. Doubtless the period of Maeterlinck's life that will matter most to his biographers has already passed. His boyhood in the old town of Ghent is in itself of peculiar interest, since he was one of the little group of poets to revive Belgian literature after its long eclipse, having as his fellows in this emprise Emile Verhaeren, Georges Rodenbach, Grégoire Le Roy, and Charles Van Lerberghe. All had been educated under the rigorous rule of the Jesuit Fathers of the College de Sainte-Barbe, an experience which Maeterlinck declares he would not begin life again if he were obliged to duplicate. His boyhood in Ghent left, indeed, a host of gloomy memories, from the few years he spent in the irksome rôle of avocat to the hostility of his fellow-townsmen toward his earliest poems, "Serres Chaudes," which branded him in Ghent as a decadent.

One who knows Ghent with its wonderful old castle and cathedral, its loitering canals overhung by flower-decked windows, its red-tiled roofs crowding into indescribable picturesqueness, will know how out of harmony the youthful Maeterlinck must have been with the ancient town when he describes it as having "little streets as narrow as your hand, with bowed down ancient houses all awry; roofs with three-cornered windows which look like sleepy eyes; hospitals, gloomy old castles, and over all a dull septentrional heaven." No wonder he left it as early as he might for the Paris of Mallarmé and Verlaine, the Paris of Villier d'L'Isle-Adam, whose stories Maeterlinck heard him recite in cafés before he set them down and to whom he later declared he owed all that he had done.

Not only the influence of this "evangelist of dream and irony," as Maeterlinck has termed Villier d' L'Isle-Adam, but the young poet's connection with the Parnassans, with the rise of the Symbolists, with the advocates of Vers Libre, indeed, with all the cults then agitating Paris, Mr. Bithell sketches delightfully, making us free of that most fascinating period and its atmosphere. The remainder of the volume takes up in detail Maeterlinck's work, analyzing the plays with discriminating, well-considered criticism.

JESSIE B. RITTENHOUSE.

HY. MAYER'S TUMBLE MAN

THE TUMBLE MAN. By Hy. Mayer. With verses by Charles Hanson Towne. D. Appleton & Co. $1.25.

Here is a book that will win a laugh from any child with every page that is turned. Such a lively trouble-maker as Tumble Man isn't often met with in the best of times. Not only is he having the most rolling and rollicking time of it in the pictures, but he has set the verses to just as jolly a measure and larky a habit. We see him first hurtling toward our world through the star-sown realms of space, and then follow him from adventure to adventure in the most breathless and engaging manner until a husky football player kicks him home again. At one moment he is rolling down stairs with delighted children after him; at the next he is playing havoc with a breakfast table or scaring an old Italian woman into volubla speech, or knocking a tenor endwise or playing a joke on a cowboy.

Hy. Mayer's delicious power of character drawing gets a good chance to make a showing in the little book, despite the freakish story it tells. The illustrations are all full pages printed in two colors, and the comical expressions on the faces of the various humans with whom Tumble Man comes into more or less wicked contact will cause the elders to smile, while the lilt of Mr. Towne's verses makes the certain-to-be-repeated demand, "please read it over," an easier task than is often the case; something that should make an especial appeal to aunts and mothers. Here is a specimen:

A theatre is full of scenes, as doubtless well you know;
But sometimes there occurs a scene which is not in the show.
It's lovely for the audience, who've paid but one admission;
But afterward the actors may have need of a physician.

Prayer

In a brief essay entitled "Prayer—What It Is and What It Does," the Rev. Dr. Samuel McComb presents thoughts and suggestions that will interest some of those who, against their wills, have been compelled to disbelieve in the rationality of prayer. Dr. McComb seems to think there are a great many persons who deeply regret their inability to pray. (Harper & Brothers. 50 cents).

Familiar Spanish Travels

By William Dean Howells

"A fragrant blend of mellow autobiography, literary associations, romantic history and charming and piquant impressions of travel."—N. Y. Tribune. "A fascinating account of Spanish life and places, all the more important because they are described and interpreted by Mr. Howells's pen. * * * We feel that he has done for Spain to-day as vividly and as faithfully what Gautier did for Spain almost a century ago."—Boston Transcript.

Social and Economic Forces in American History

American life, the manners and customs of our ancestors, from the earliest colonial days, are here described by the distinguished scholars who have contributed to the twenty-seven volumes of the "American Nation." The general reader, as well as the historian, will find these pages full of interest. A work of authority.

The American Civil War

By James Kendall Hosmer

A short, convenient and authoritative account of the great conflict. This two-volume history of the appeal to arms and the hostilities from 1861 to 1865 provides a work compact, impartial and vigorously told.

Miracles of Science

By Henry Smith Williams

The story of the modern miracles of the laboratory and observatory told in popular language free from technicalities, so that the least scientific reader will understand and enjoy it. In fascinating chapters are revealed the latest developments of science in astronomy, physics, chemistry, biology and medicine.

Whistler Stories

By Don C. Seitz

Gleaned from many sources, here for the first time these stories may be found all together, without the distraction of other material. Gossipy, witty, anecdotes are related of Whistler's relations with Rossetti, Millais, Macmonnies, George Moore, Justin McCarthy, Oscar Wilde, Disraeli, Du Maurier, Carlyle, Henry Irving, Mark Twain, Edwin Abbey, Labouchere and, of course, Ruskin.

WITH A PURPOSE

Cosmo Hamilton's "The Door That Has No Key"

THE DOOR THAT HAS NO KEY. By Cosmo Hamilton. George H. Doran Company. $1.25.

JUDGING from his letter printed in THE BOOK REVIEW a few weeks since, it would seem that Cosmo Hamilton was—or is—decidedly uncertain as to the kind of greeting this new novel of his may receive from the English library censors. It is perhaps as well, therefore, to say at the very outset that we have no quarrel with him on account of the delicate and difficult subject he has chosen, because he has treated that subject seriously and, generally speaking, with dignity. "The Door That Has No Key" is not one of those books which are usually described as "spicy" or "risqué." It was evidently written with an earnest purpose, not in order to please sensation mongers or the evil-minded; and yet from one point of view we regard "The Door That Has No Key" as an immoral book. Not because it deals frankly with the relations between the sexes, but because it glosses over and, inferentially at least, condones the great wrong which was done to the little boy, Pat.

Jack Scorrier, the hero of the book, a man of high ideals and an honesty which his best friend, Mallow, and even his father and mother regard as Quixotic and a trifle absurd, falls in love at first sight with Violet Melksham, simply and solely because she is beautiful. She marries him for the sake of his social position, having little or none of her own, and then refuses to fulfill her part of the tacit bargain, holding out to him, however, a hope that eventually she will yield. Very ambitious, and, according to the author, exceedingly clever, she furthers her husband's advancement by every means in her power. She desires above all things that he shall go into Parliament, and when the chance of a Radical seat is offered him she is willing to go to any lengths in order to persuade him to accept it, although he is a Unionist. And it is then that seeing her at last as she is he turns to another woman—a woman who loves him, but whom he does not love.

Mr. Hamilton apparently has a very great admiration for his hero, though like the rest of the people in the book he evidently regards him as a rare and startling exception because of the perfect cleanliness of his life. From childhood he had had "a too keen sense of honesty" and also "an uncomfortable knack of wanting to know." Mallow, his friend, describes him as a man who has ideals and for that reason is always "marching up to the door that has no key," endeavoring to unravel "the Master-knot of Human Fate." He even goes so far as to tell the unvarnished truth in the case which gives him his first opportunity to win distinction in his profession—he is a barrister—thereby astonishing the entire courtroom and laying the foundations for a most successful career. "He stood for honesty at the bar." Yet he became dishonest in the most vital of all human relationships, and for this he, as well as the author, lays all the blame upon Violet, who certainly deserved a great deal of it, if not the whole.

A woman whose entire life was conducted upon the principle of taking everything and giving nothing, she would be repulsive if she were real. But never from her first appearance until the theatrical and, we believe, unnatural last scene is she a person, but only a thing controlled and mantpulated by the author to suit his purpose. Indeed, the great flaw in Mr. Hamilton's book, considering it as a work of art, is this: That his characters strike one as having been manufactured to fit into prearranged situations. Only the minor persons—Jack's father and mother, whose love for each other and for their son is tenderly and beautifully portrayed, his sporting uncle, and perhaps one or two others—seem like flesh-and-blood human beings. Even Miss Hubbard, "the little live thing," never actually lives for the readers, and therefore loses much of the sympathy she might otherwise obtain by her great self-sacrifice, despite the fact that she, too, like Jack and the author, puts little or no stress upon what was in truth the crux of the situation, the wrong done to the child—the child born with a terrible handicap, branded in the eyes of the world. Miss Hubbard got a good deal of what she wanted; so, too, did Jack, even though he was obliged, being unwilling to destroy his career, to take it by stealth; and the chances are ninety-nine out of a hundred that in the end their boy paid the price.

"The Door That Has No Key" is an interesting and a thoughtful book, one sure to be widely discussed. Parts of it, especially those describing Ethel's illness and death, and the daily round at Speakwell, are very well written; in others the phrasing is occasionally a trifle careless. Jack's early struggles with himself are graphically pictured, even if his exuberance at the time of his engagement seems overdone and a bit repellant, while in the courtroom scene the climax is cleverly led up to. The reader is inclined to doubt, however, whether even the sharp lesson she then received could completely alter a woman like Mrs. Verney-Waveney. Mr. Hamilton's book will probably be vehemently praised and as vehemently condemned. It is, in fact, a novel which any person conversant with modern literature and modern thought should welcome as a praiseworthy addition to our current literature.

CHICAGO PILGRIM

What He Finds During a Ramble in England

THE PILGRIM FROM CHICAGO. BEING MORE RAMBLES WITH AN AMERICAN. By Christian Tearle. With twenty-seven illustrations. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $2.50 net.

A FORMER volume, "Rambles with an American," recorded certain literary pilgrimages undertaken between the author and a supposititious American, Mr. James C. Fairfield of Chicago, U. S. A. The author himself is a dweller in that ancient sanctuary of law and celibacy, the Temple. Here we are to imagine Mr. James C. Fairfield (what humor that central initial assumes in the eye of the true-born Briton! how much quainter it is than, say, J. Cholmondeley Fairfield) looking up the Templar, and inciting him to new expeditions in the field of literary topography. The first nook of fame to be unearthed is Jacob's Island. The Templar barely knows that it is mentioned in "Oliver Twist." James C., a confessed adorer of Dickens, has all the master's descriptions of the haunt of Bill Sikes at his tongue's end, with an old map of that part of London and a sketch of his own, elaborating the detail of the Sikes quarter. What they find afoot on Jacob's Island is somewhat shadowy, but James C. is confident that he identifies the sites of the house where Sikes met his end, of the bridge on which Brownlow stood with the excited crowd about him, and of Huffham's storeyard. The enthusiast's final triumph is the enunciation of the theory that Dickens knew Jacob's Island as a child. A Huffham was his godfather, and had some kind of waterside business. Dickens often visited him as a child: ergo, the Huffham of Jacob's Island must have been Dickens's sponsor.

There follows a pilgrimage to the old church of St. Pancras, still interesting in itself despite restorations and mistaken "improvements," and yet more interesting for its graveyard. There Jeremy Collier was buried, and that other eminent man, Jonathan Wild, though it was not long before the "resurrectionists" relieved the place of the thief-taker by carrying him off in state in a coach and six. There, says James C., Jerry Cruncher did his famous job at the trade of resurrection. There, at the grave of Mary Wollstonecraft, Shelley persuaded young Mary Godwin to trust herself to him. And there the unhappy Chatterton loitered for three days before he took himself out of a rough world. Other expeditions take us, by winding ways full of literary and historical meaning to our pilgrims, to the ancient priory of the Grey Friars, at Canterbury, where Lovelace may have written the immortal farewell "To Lucasta: Going to the Wars": to the birthplaces, dwellings, or haunts of Lamb, Fielding, Goldsmith, Johnson, Cowper, and a score of others who have taken on to most of us a vagueness and remoteness as of figures merely fabulous. Yet here in old London they lived and drank and loved and went to dust—a little before us, that is all. A trite reflection, but it is to bring it home as a reality that we visit the shrines and cherish the relics of the great dead. And if we cannot do this in person we owe gratitude to those who do it for us in such a way as to give us millions of stay-at-homes something of their own feeling of direct contact with greatness.

Such an office this book performs, modestly, but none the less successfully because of its air of familiar gossip. The profusion of anecdotes with which its pages are filled are drawn not merely from books, but from that store of local tradition with which few pilgrims, even from Chicago, have time or opportunity to saturate themselves. It is generous in Mr. Tearle to attribute to our fellow-countryman so much of the lore which, from his vantage-point at Gray's Inn, he has been able to amass. Now and then he speaks more evidently in his own person. There are several chapters on the Temple, and the final one takes us through the evening shadows of Gray's Inn and its memory-haunted gardens.

EVERY man with good red blood in his veins likes to read about the stirring cowboy days of the Old West.

Cow punching was no placid occupation in the seventies; it called for the utmost in courage and endurance, and a type of "Rough Rider" was evolved the like of which for reckless courage and splendid daring the world has never seen.

Mr. Mulford writes of these old romantic days. His Bar 20 Ranch yarns have become famous. Here are further accounts of the happenings at the ranch, strenuous tales all of them, and one of the best is the story of "How Hopalong Cassidy Got His Hop."

Theodore Roosevelt: An Autobiography

The Book of the Year

Colonel Roosevelt's Own Story of His Life

This exceptional book, written in Colonel Roosevelt's characteristically vigorous and easily flowing colloquial style, is one that will make a strong and satisfying appeal to every class of readers,—

Not only as the official life story of Colonel Roosevelt's remarkable career, but as one of the great literary events of the year.

For many years no other single personality of the present day has attracted such general attention in national and world-wide policies, and no more vivid picture of contemporaneous history probably will ever be written than Colonel Roosevelt's own story of his life.

In its interpretation of Colonel Roosevelt's striking personality, this work is not only of national but of international importance.

From his boyhood days in New York, his adolescent youth at Harvard University, his young manhood days in the wild West, and through a diversified public career which led to the Presidency of the United States, Colonel Roosevelt was a learner as well as a born leader.

In this book he tells of the many things which he learned and how he learned them, relating them primarily with a view to the help they may give others.

To the lover of the strenuous life as well as to the student of contemporaneous history, to the young people of the country particularly, who all find a special attraction in personal narrative of active achievement, this autobiography will afford keen satisfaction and high inspiration.

The book is handsomely bound and is unusually attractive, with illustrations of portraits, fac-similes of various documents, pictures of buildings, localities, and other intresting and appropriate matter.

WAR AND WASTE

Armies and Navies as President Jordan Sees Them

WAR AND WASTE. By David Starr Jordan. Doubleday, Page & Co. New York, 1913. Price $1.25.

AVERY full and able presentation of the case against war forms the content of David Starr Jordan's latest volume on "War and Waste." (Doubleday, Page & Co.) While no new and startling evidence is adduced in the cause of peace, the facts are marshaled in an admirable and convincing manner, to which the author's personal views concerning such current international problems as the Balkan war and the "Yellow Peril" lend added interest.

The main arguments advanced against war are two: that it destroys the fittest, leaving the propagation of the race to the inferior stock; and that it produces excessive taxation, and increases the cost of living. Elaborating the first point, President Jordan states that any influence that brings about the destruction of the strong, the brave, and the enterprising results in a generation that shows those qualities in a lesser degree. "Rome fell" he says, "because the old Roman stock was for the most part banished or exterminated," and the perfection of Greek art, philosophy and literature was lost when its creators perished in a suicidal war, leaving none of their kind to replace them.

So in modern times it is the "best they breed," the young men between 18 and 35, that the nations send forth to the hardships and dangers of foreign service, while the mediocre, the inferior, and the unfit remain at home to determine, willy nilly, the future of the State. To the four millions of men who fell in Napoleon's campaigns may be ascribed, thinks the writer, the social and personal deficiencies of the common folk of Europe to-day, while few will attempt to controvert the statement that the backwardness in the arts, sciences, and industries of such States as Virginia, Louisiana, and the Carolinas is due almost wholly to the thousands of strong young lives wiped out in the frightful carnage of the civil war. Altogether, there is a strong probability that the men who died in "the weary time" had "better stuff in them than the father of the average man of to-day."

As a contributing cause of the high cost of living, Mr. Jordan points out that the world's annual expenditure on armies and navies in this time of comparative peace exceeds four billion. As all of this sum must be raised by taxation, it represents a constant drain on commerce and industry, the ultimate results of which have yet to be faced. In Europe the war debt, which amounts to over four times the world's entire stock of gold, has become the great menace of national life, and the credit of the nations is in the hands of the bankers and money lenders like the Rothschilds. Meantime, the great armament trusts, who play into each other's hands and employ the most powerful lobby in the world, disseminate war scares through the "Armor-Plate Press" affecting public opinion, and thereby extracting new and greater appropriations from the Governments.

The recent Italian war was largely a result of speculations of the Bank of Rome, while the encouragement of the Balkan war can be charged off to French bankers and armament firms. It all becomes especially ridiculous to the writer when he considers that war, except through some wholly uncontrollable accident, is already impossible to these debt-laden nations of Europe.

In the United States we are spending two-thirds of our annual income on national defense without enough left over to go round for any useful purpose whatsoever. Our credit is still good, but our military expenditures are increasing.

It is no tribute to our "Yankee horse sense" that we develop our national defenses at the bidding of the armament lobby. It is no evidence of our patriotic forethought that we spend nearly a million dollars every day to ward off imaginary attacks from an outworn, bankrupt, and impotent mediaevalism which could not harm us if it would, and would not if it could. * * * But the stage is set. The play is on and war scares and war waste in time of peace will not end until we develop a robust public opinion which shall realize the fact that feudalism is dead, that war is dying, and that the time has come for nations to devote their mind and money to things more real and more pressing.

As an example of peaceful methods of "national defense," President Jordan points to our Canadian border, which, without soldiers, guns, or fortifications, has been undisturbed for over half a century. However, he realizes that the absolute disarmament of nations is not to be attained in a day, or even in a generation. It will be a slow progress, to which the growth of the popular conscience, the interlocking of personal and national interests and the ruinous expense of modern equipment for warfare will eventually bring us. He has no doubt, despite any momentary reaction in public opinion, that the "way out of war will open the world over, with the enlightenment of public opinion, with the extension of international law, and the perfection of the international courts at The Hague."

HUMOR AND LIFE

An Entertaining Combination in "Here Are Ladies"

By HILDEGARDE HAWTHORNE

HERE ARE LADIES. By James Stevens. The Macmillan Company. $1.25.

NOT only are there ladies here, but men and incidents, love and hatred—all sorts of side-lights and glimpses at life from a whimsical, humorous point of view that does not lack in human feeling.

The book is not a collection of stories, since there is nothing of plot, and hardly what might be called a situation in the length and breadth of it. It is a series of fragments, of snatches from the lives of men and women, thumb-nail sketches of striking or revealing moments where the workmanship is excellent and the character portrayal delicious.

There are, for instance, the "Three Heavy Husbands." (And surely nothing could be happier than Mr. Stevens's titles.) Each appears at an instant of stress, hangs in his dilemma gasping, and disappears. The most engaging is the silent man, faced at the moment of approaching marriage with the to him ghastly necessity of finding topics on which to talk for the entire remainder of his life. Frantically, he turns the matter over and over:

After one has married a lady what does one say to her? He could not conceive any one saying anything beyond "Good morning." Then the other aspect arrested him: "What does a woman find to say to a man?" Perhaps safety lay in that direction. He looked upon his sweetheart as from a distance and tried to reconstruct her recent conversations. He was amazed at the little he could remember. "I, I, I; we, we, we; this shop, that shop, Aunt Ellen, and chocolates." As far as he could recollect, he had said nothing in reply but "Oh, yes," and "To be sure." Could he sustain a lifetime of small talk on such meagre responses?

In "Three Women Who Wept" and "Three Young Wives" a homely tragedy joins hands with comedy and foot it together down the page. There is no connection between these and other groups of three contained in the book. Each goes solitary, but the mood in which they are written is of the same color.

The most charming thing about Mr. Stevens is his way of saying things. You are continually running across bits of description or philosophy that you want to take out and keep just for the joy of the wording. Here are a few:

"A hat," said she, "is something to cover one's head from the rain, and a frock is something to guard one's limbs from inclement weather. To that extent I am interested in these things; but they would put a hat on my mind and a black cloth on my understanding."

He was towed along by his sister, a girl so tall that one might say her legs reached to heaven—and maybe they did.

He was one of those men who are called "strong" because of their imperfect control over themselves.

And here is a paragraph on primness that will surely make many a man smile—and sigh:

Primness is the most everlasting, indestructible trait of humanity. It can outface the Sphinx. It is destructible only by death. Whoever has married a prim woman must hand over his breeches and his purse; he will collect postage stamps in his old age; he will twiddle his thumbs and smile when the visitor asks him a question; he will grow to dislike beer, and will admit and assert that man's place is in the home.

And who could better this terse portrait of a boy?

Bull was such a boy. He was densely packed with pugnacity. He lived forever on the extreme slope of a fight, down which he slid at a word, a nod, a wink, into strenuous and bloody warfare. He was never seen without a black eye, a bruised lip, or something wrong with his ear.

"The Blind Man" is perhaps the best piece in the volume. It is a grim sketch of a certain temperament in a particular individual, and there is not an unnecessary word in it. It is the very stuff of catastrophe, and one ends it with a caught breath, wondering, waiting for a crash.

The last pages of the book, near to 100, are taken up by the cogitations and monologues of an old gentleman who haunts a "Tavern in Our Town." The humor is here occasionally forced, occasionally obvious, but always pleasant and present. There are few subjects the old gentleman hesitates to tackle, and by and large he lets fall a good deal of honest wisdom. What he has to say on the subject of food should meet with deep appreciation in this day of steaks and eggs worth their weight in gold. And since it is with that particular homily that the book closes, there can be no better place from which to bid it adieu.

BASED ON A BANDIT

A PLAYTHING OF THE GODS. By Carl Gray. Illustrated. Sherman, French & Co. $1.25.

Joaquin Murieta, the bandit who made his name a terror in the early days of California and around whose career gathered many a romantic tale, furnishes the basis for Carl Gray's story of California in the middle decades of the last century. He makes his story one long picture of Murieta's life, from his boyhood in an old mission school in Southern California until his death, and his hero is constantly in the middle of the stage. There is not much in the chronicle that is true to the realities of Murieta's career, but there is some verisemblance in the general atmosphere, and here and there in particular things, especially those that denote a mental attitude, such as the hatred of the Californians in the early days for the Americans. But, as a story about a bandit, it has many exciting moments, some dramatic scenes, and through most of its pages a well-sustained suspense.

FOOTBALL

Mr. Reed's Helpful Book for Public and Player

FOOTBALL FOR PUBLIC AND PLAYER. By Herbert Reed, ("Right Wing.") Frederick A. Stokes Company.

BY writing his little book, "Football for Public and Player," Mr. Reed has not only done a real service to one of the most popular sports in the world but has made a genuine contribution to the enjoyment of those thousands who love to watch the shock and shift of the football field. Between the covers of the book there is material for many a Winter's evening of delightful occupation for any one who would review in retrospect the football season in the light of wider knowledge of the game, or who would prepare himself for added enjoyment in the seasons that are to come. "Right Wing," as Mr. Reed has come to be familiarly known to the newspaper public of New York from his illuminating writings on other sports as well as football, has here undertaken to perform a new service for the layman—and laywoman—who loves the most strenuous of games—that of teaching the spectator how to see beyond the mere surfaces of the mimic warfare of the chalked field, how to look away from the ball, and how to realize the vital and necessary part which each man must fill in a contest which is primarily one of co-operation.

To do this successfully—to make clear without unnecessary technicalities the meaning of the complicated evolutions of football—is no mean task. But it has been accomplished triumphantly, and no one could read "Right Wing's" chapter on "Coaching for the Spectator—How to Follow the Modern Game," without learning a great deal and having his enjoyment in past, and especially in future, games greatly heightened. The value of small things in judging a team's play and predicting its chances of victory is well brought out. After hints on how to learn to identify individual players and how to judge of the effect of sun and wind and footing come some paragraphs on the work of the line which well illustrate Mr. Reed's lucid and helpful manner in football science:

The first thing to note, and note carefully, is the work of the two sets of forwards. The team playing against the wind will probably start a running play or two soon after the game begins, and even if the first play be from kick formation there will be instant opportunity to size up the "jump" of the lines, for upon this "jump" the result of the battle may, and often does, depend. Should the forwards of the team carrying—not kicking—the ball get a little the better of the charge and get it as often as twice out of three plays, the fact is significant, for under the rule these men are not allowed to use their hands, must charge across the neutral zone between the lines, and have more difficulty in reaching the defensive players than the defensive men in reaching them.

Now, in watching this line at work the eye must exclude absolutely everything else, taking in the runner only as he reaches the line of scrimmage, and in case forwards are found going clear through to the secondary defense they should be followed to the end of their charge to ascertain whether or no they have accomplished their purpose of accounting for at least one man beyond the line of scrimmage. Just a moment before the ball is snapped many of the forwards will have one knee on the ground, but the men will come up together to the crouch at some part of the signal, and if one man is behind the others he may be put down as a weak member. Absolute unison is one of the signs of a good set of forwards.

There is much in the book besides coaching for the spectator. Mr. Reed tells of the development of the game, compares football and warfare, writes of the relations of captain and coaches, and has chapters on selecting the material and building the team, coaching systems, "scouts," the trainer, advanced football, advanced team play, the field and its zones of play, sectional and team types, genius on the gridiron and the ethics of the game. Good illustrations and helpful diagrams of plays add to the value of the text. Altogether, "Right Wing" has done a needed thing excellently, and all who have an interest in the great American game, from coach to humblest spectator, owe him gratitude.

By Elizabeth D. Van Denburg

Realistic pictures of South American and Hawaiian life more than half a century ago. The day by day diary of a very bright girl while accompanying her parents on an eight months' voyage to Honolulu, her father, the Hon. Joel Turrill, having been appointed U. S. Consul General to the Sandwich Islands by President Polk.

The ship touched at the chief South American ports, and things as they then were and the incidents of the voyage are most entertainingly described.

A Person of Quality

By ASHTON HILLIERS

A unique novel. A competent critic says: "It somewhat resembles 'The Broad Highway,' but in my judgment excels that book. Notably in the manner in which it follows the development of Pambewe's character as well as his fortunes; also there is a very pretty mystery to hold the reader—many well-drawn characters, and one of the tenderest love stories I have read for many a day."

Frontispiece in color. 12mo. Cloth, Net $1.25.

A Term of Silence

By FORREST HALSEY

Because a story deals with the tragic experiences in a man's life done out, of necessity, deprive the reader of all the interesting thrills he has accustomed himself to look for when he peruses a novel. Cases in point are "The Count of Monte Cristo" and "Les Miserables."

Prison life forms a large part of this story also, but there is a very dramatic prosecution of all the incidents.

16mo. Cloth, Net $1.00.

The Third Act

By FRED JACKSON

The author is well known to the readers of the popular magazines, but this is his first novel in book form. He gives a brilliant picture of theatrical life as experienced by a young and ambitious playwright straight from the country, who makes an instant appeal to one of the leading actresses, and in turn falls a victim to her charms, which results in interesting complications.

Colored frontispiece. 12mo. Cloth, Net $1.00.

A Woman in Revolt

By ANNE LEE

This book tells the story of a woman who, as a type, may be said to be the last word in feminine evolution. A daring subject is handled in a daring way, but by none but the outstanding or the prurient can its high purpose be misconstrued.

The social evil with its awful harvest of ruined lives has been approached from many sides by men; here the woman's side is presented and with exceptional force.

12mo. Cloth, Net $1.25.

Barks and Purrs

By COLETTE WILLY

This is by the famous French author, Colette Willy, and consists of animated and witty dialogues between two pets in a Parisian household—a French bull and an Angora cat, in which the natures of Master and Mistress are skillfully reflected.

Deliciously satirical and thoroughly enjoyable.

Translated by Maire Kelly. About 100 marginal illustrations. 12mo. Cloth. Net $1.25.

The Fairy Minstrel of Glenmalure

By EDMUND LEAMY

By the author of "The Golden Spears and Other Fairy Tales," which, in a few years, has reached such favor as to win the distinction of being regarded by librarians as a classic for both old and young.

Illustrated in color by Vera Cassean. Small 4to. Cloth, Net 75 cents.

Out of the North

By HOWARD V. SUTHERLAND

A volume of Klondyke verse of rare beauty. A characteristic introduction by Joaquin Miller gives the stamp of approval of one who knows.

COL. ROOSEVELT

Sidelights on Current Affairs in His Autobiography

THEODORE ROOSEVELT. AN AUTOBIOGRAPHY. Illustrated. Macmillan & Co. $2.00.

FOR some time a series of articles by ex-President Roosevelt, in which he has recounted some of his experiences and observations, have been appearing in The Outlook, and these he has revised and published in the form of a book. He has styled it "An Autobiography," but this is hardly a happy name for the very interesting volume he has compiled; for, as he himself says in his foreword, "naturally there are chapters of my autobiography which cannot now be written," and these are of necessity some of the most important. Moreover, there is very little of the formal autobiography about what he has written.

His first chapters might well be styled "Recollections," for the Colonel lets his memory play over the early period of his career with the serene confidence that anything he may say, however trivial, about his start in life and his adventures in the West will be read with interest by his host of admirers. As he goes on to speak about his term as Governor and his two terms as President, he is obliged by the very wealth of his material to write about subjects rather than about himself, and to be content with setting forth the position that he assumed on a number of the great questions with which he had to do. Indeed, it might be fitting to term the last half of his work an "apology" for his official life, if one could take from that word any connotation of regret for anything that he had done. The ex-President explains to the public exactly what he did and why he did it, because he knows that it would like to hear his views, and not because he dreams that he has anything for which he need offer an excuse.

Few men have lived days so filled with doings as Col. Roosevelt, and his work covers an immense field. As he talks of his days at Mulberry Street he has something to say about the Sunday liquor question and the white slave problem; as he writes of the Spanish war he draws a picture of the unpreparedness of the country and a moral as to the proper policy to be pursued with regard to the army and navy; as he comes to his life as President, all the controversies with which his name was associated come in for more or less mention. It is of course impossible in such a notice as this to dwell on more than a few of the many subjects of which he treats, but not the least interesting of these at the present crisis in this State are the Colonel's views on the proper attitude of the reformer toward the political game.

However men may differ about Col. Roosevelt, it is admitted by all that he is a master politician. As he recalls his entry into political strife he touches on his experience with Senator Platt and the way in which he met that crafty and powerful boss. He tells one incident that parallels some of the recent revelations about Tammany Hall. After his election as Governor, Col. Roosevelt says, the Senator asked him to call, and immediately congratulated him on having an admirable man to be his Superintendent of Public Works. Then he handed the Governor-elect a telegram announcing that a man he had never thought of would accept the position and apparently considered that that closed the matter.

Gov. Roosevelt refused to submit to such dictation, but he never attempted to administer his office without the aid of Platt as the leader of the Republican State Party. "My desire was to achieve results, and not merely to issue manifestos of virtue," he remarks, and the passage in which he sets forth his policy toward the "bosses" and the party organization is well worth the careful study of those who would appreciate the great game of American politics and how one of its most successful exponents understands its rules.

It is Mr. Bryan whom Col. Roosevelt blames for the growth of the power of "big business" in politics and the fostering of that "invisible empire" of which we have heard so much. The absolute chaos which free silver meant to men of affairs drove them into politics and forced them to take an interest in matters which, in his younger days, when he stood for the Assembly, they had been accustomed to leave to the professionals. He tells us:

> Good and high-minded men of conservative temperament in their panic played into the hands of the ultra-reactionaries of business and politics. The alliance between the two kinds of privilege, political and financial, was closely cemented, and wherever there was any attempt to break it up the cry was at once raised that this merely represented another phase of the assault on national honesty and individual and mercantile integrity.

When he became President Col. Roosevelt determined to break this condition of affairs and to restore the Republican Party to its high estate by the strenuous use of the powers of his office. The first of the hits he makes at Mr. Taft are to be found as he sets forth his own theory of what the President might and might not do. He made, he says, a resolute effort to get on with Senators Aldrich and Hale and with Speaker Cannon, but found by degrees that he could only accomplish his purposes by appealing over their heads to the people and thus managed to get results until almost the close of his term.

As the ex-President thinks of those last stormy four months, as he refers to the series of conflicts between himself and the Congressional majority, which he says were "quite as bitter as if they and I belonged to different political parties," the fighting spirit of the author comes out. "However, I held my own," he remarks, and all who remember those strenuous days will admit that he does not exaggerate. "I was not able to push through the legislation I desired during those four months, but I was able to prevent them doing anything I did not desire or undoing anything that I had already succeeded in getting done."

For Col. Roosevelt, in contrasting his view of the Presidency and that of Mr. Taft, says that he—regarding the Executive as subject only to the people and, under the Constitution, bound to serve the people in cases where the Constitution does not explicitly forbid him to render the service—was following, substantially, "the course followed by both Andrew Jackson and Abraham Lincoln":

> Other honorable and well-meaning Presidents, such as James Buchanan, took the opposite, and, as it seems to me, narrowly legalistic view that the President is the servant of Congress rather than of the people and can do nothing, no matter how necessary it be, to act unless the Constitution explicitly commands the action.

So Col. Roosevelt likes to talk of his own attitude toward public affairs as of the Jackson-Lincoln attitude, and to set over against it the Buchanan-Taft attitude. It is curious and a little painful to see the way in which the ex-President refers to his old friend. In his chapter on the Presidency he delights to quote the high compliment paid by Ambassador Bryce to the character of the men whom the author had gathered around him. Mr. Taft was one, perhaps the chief of these, and yet all that Col. Roosevelt can find to say of him is to attack him for his reference of the Ballinger charges to Congress, for his removal of Gifford Pinchot and Ambassador White, and for his error in pardoning Charles W. Morse. He has nothing to say about the revision of the tariff, but then that is a subject on which throughout his book he is practically silent.

In his pages dealing with foreign affairs ex-President Roosevelt takes great credit to himself for having been the first to place The Hague Tribunal in a position of real influence among the nations. He describes the calculations which led him to endeavor to bring the Russian and the Japanese to an understanding, and dwells on the difficulty he found in inducing the latter to give up the idea of an indemnity. Perhaps what has since come out about the exhaustion of Japan and the peculiar military condition of the Russian Empire may make some of his readers question the accuracy of his estimate of the situation, but he has no doubt himself that he was absolutely correct. The Colonel censures the Japanese Government for what he condemns as their "bluff" toward their own people, and puts down to that the disorders which ensued in Japan when the terms of the treaty of Portsmouth were known.

> "In both Russia and Japan I believe that the net result as regards myself was a feeling of injury and of dislike of me among the people at large. I had expected this; I regarded it as entirely natural, and I did not resent it in the least," he says with resignation.

Ex-President Roosevelt also gives a full statement of his Panama policy and inserts a list of the troubles of that part of the world, while it was under the control of Colombia, as a justification of its annexation by the United States. As he looks back over what he accomplished he feels he can say: "From the beginning to the end our course was straightforward and in absolute accord with the highest standards of international morality. Criticism of it can come only from misinformation or else from a sentimentality which represents both mental weakness and a moral twist."

There is no space here to do more than refer to the portions of this volume which tell of the non-political sides of Col. Roosevelt's life. He has many good stories, of course, to tell of life in the West and the chase; he writes of the Cuban campaign with honest pride in the achievements of the Rough Riders, and he gives a few glimpses of his happy home life. In fact there are few departments of his strenuous career up to the close of his second term at the White House on which he has not written in his own vigorous characteristic fashion. He has expressed his views freely on the events of the past and the possibilities of to-day, and the book is very well worth reading, not only for the man who wrote it, but for the interest of the things which he has to tell.

BOSTON LITERARY NEWS

BOSTON, Nov. 21.—Two publications of the second series of the Humanists' Library, issued by the Merrymount Press, will continue with Thomas Stanley's translation of Pico della Mirandola's "A Platonick Discourse Upon Love." Stanley, is of course, doubly responsible for the final "k" in platonick, inasmuch as he was an Englishman and therefore used the final palatal sound unknown to the Italian mouth, and also because his translation was printed before the nineteenth century English printers dropped the final "k." What would he have said had anybody suggested that "love" should be spelled "luv"? Probably, being Milton's contemporary and brother poet, he could have found suitably strong language, but as the book will not appear until Spring there is time enough for conjecture. The volume will be edited by Edmund G. Gardner, author of "Ariosto, Prince of Court Poets."

***

As a companion volume, the supervisor of the Press, Mr. D. B. Updike, announces Archbishop Della Casa's "Galateo," the rival of "The Courtier" in the number of its reprints. In its author's own time versions appeared in all the Western European tongues, and the English translation was made by Robert Petersen, a barrister, in 1516. The editor, J. E. Spingarn, provides an introduction treating the Renaissance ideals of courtesy in a novel style, and at considerable length.

Houghton Mifflin Company find it necessary to delay publishing the last volume of Emerson's Journals until January, but the ninth volume is listed for publication to-morrow. Henry Adams's "Mont Saint Michel and Chartres"; A. E. Johnson's "The Russian Ballet"; "The Life of Charles F. McKim," by Alfred H. Granger; "Bull Run," by R. M. Johnston, editor of The Corsican, and "The Ride Home," by Florence Wilkinson Evans, are in the same group.

***

On the same day will come a Riverside Press edition of Carlyle's "The Diamond Necklace." It will be adorned with vignettes from rare and beautiful French books printed in the last days of the monarchy, and will be bound in hand-made paper boards with a cloth back and gold tooling. The size will be a small octavo, and luxury-loving Marie Antoinette could have asked for nothing prettier in the way of a book.

The firm has given its holiday catalogue a cover in Christmas colors, a heavily laden Christmas tree visible through a window in a brick wall being its design.

A sixth edition of Prof. Münsterberg's "Psychology and Industrial Efficiency" indicates that both employer and employed are diligently studying the human being who stands between the capitalist and the machine, and between the machine and the consumer. There is no such thing as isolation.

Mrs. Eleanor H. Porter has laid aside the Pollyanna books long enough to correct the proof of a new "Miss Billy" book, "Miss Billy's Decision," and L. C. Page & Co. will publish it early in 1914. "Miss Billy's Decision," the second of this series, is in its fifth printing already.

STEPHENSON BROWNE.

"THE MAIN ROAD"

THE MAIN ROAD. By Maode Radford Warren. With frontispiece. Harper & Bros. $1.35 net.

The evolution of Janet Bellamy from a self-centred, sentimental, little fool into a generous, broad-minded woman is the theme of this new novel. Most of the scenes are laid in Chicago; first at the university, then in a fine house on the Lake Shore Drive, later in a model tenement inhabited by "reformers and writers and painters and one or two newspaper men." Janet is one of those women who are "born with too much feeling," but she has intelligence enough to profit by the disciplining life gives her.

Brought up on romances and the "sheltered" theory, her one idea at the outset is a lover and marriage; that she may be worthy of the unknown beloved she desires culture, and insists upon going to college. Then she meets many people, and has a love affair which ends in her being jilted. Heart-broken, as she believes, and, utterly humiliated, she first tries society as a panacea. She is afterward caught up in the suffrage movement, and circumstances finally cause her to leave her cousin's luxurious home and rent a flat in the model tenement. Brought into relations with several reformers, she takes part in the garment strike. And at last a good man's love crowns her life.

Janet is in many ways a typical woman of the present transition period, and the road she travels is one along which many are struggling toward a larger, fuller existence than was ever before possible. The book would be better if the author had not, at the end, dealt out happiness quite so lavishly, but it is always interesting, and often illuminating.

Gnomes of the Saline Mountains

By Anna Goldwork Gross

A fantastic story, half fairy tale, is told by Mrs. Gross, who seems to be thoroughly familiar with the folk lores of Germany and Italy. As a result, these stories of love, desertion, and revenge are given a perfect setting.—Los Angeles Express.

The author's familiarity with life in the great cities of the old world has enabled her to paint an interesting and instructive background to these romantic stories.—Baltimore American.

Real life is pictured, notwithstanding the introduction of the Gnomes, and there is a great deal of human sympathy expressed in the stories.—Dallas News.

Laden with romance.—Portland Oregonian.

"The Gnomes of the Saline Mountains" is an excellent Christmas story and very suitable for a holiday gift book.—Times, Jacksonville, Fla.

WITH MR. BENNETT

Familiar Places as a Realist Sees Them

PARIS NIGHTS AND OTHER IMPRESSIONS OF PLACES AND PEOPLE. By Arnold Bennett. George H. Doran Company. $3.

MANY an author has written of the commonplace—stern realists who thrust our daily lives into our faces, as it were, and exclaim, "Here is a picture of you in your habit as you live, and an ugly, frayed-out, undistinguished enough habit it is. Take it or leave it." And, recognizing the ugly, frayed-out, undistinguished truth of the picture, indignantly we leave it, and hold out our arms to the romanticists, who soothe us and tell us to never mind the fact that we are spavined and broken-winded—we have beautiful eyes, and some time a Prince or Princess will come along and marry us for the loveliness of our soul. But romance does not console us long. We know in our hearts that souls and matrimony have little to do with each other, and we have doubts about the beauty of our eyes. Then, conveniently midway between sad reality and glowing illusion, stands Mr. Arnold Bennett ready to catch us on the rebound.

Mr. Bennett's specialty is the enhaloing of the commonplace. We can't recall a single genius in his novels—except the very ungenius-like genius of "Buried Alive,"—but all his characters are as interesting as we are to ourselves. In the by-products of his pen, "The Plain Man and His Wife," &c., we find the same quality, and in the first part of "Paris Nights," especially the part that is Paris nights, and not Piccadilly afternoons, the ordinary and the tiresome are so disguised and enhanced as to appear extraordinary and enchanting, yet without ceasing to be their recognizable selves. It is hocus-pocus.

The "impressions" in Mr. Bennett's new book are not new in themselves, having appeared in various English periodicals, but will be new to most American readers. They range in subject from the beauty of the Riviera and the psychology of Monte Carlo to the domestic manners of the Smiths, gathered together in a handsome volume illustrated by E. A. Rickards.

Some readers of a sensitively literary turn may sniff at "Paris Nights," because its sketches are of the journals journalistic. The present writer fails to see why journalism is not as legitimate a branch of literature as the epic poem, which also recounts the deeds of heroes. The question to be considered is not whether a book of this sort is journalism or literature, but whether it is good journalism or poor journalism—the "literature" will take care of itself.

Of the early chapters of "Paris Nights" one can say heartily that they are good; of much of the remainder only that it is good hackwork. Throughout there are scattered arresting phrases, "I was as happy as though I had shot a reviewer without being found out"; pregnant phrases, "Can any nation be musical which does not listen chiefly to its own music?" and phrases which sparkle with satire. Witness his description of the "manual of advice to domestic servants upon their department," which he saw "in the workbasket of the wife of a wealthy English Socialist."

Now and then we catch the author winking at himself in the mirror, as when he says of the thrill he feels on a first glimpse of the Alps, of the desert, or when he crosses a frontier—"this thrill, ever returning, is the reward of a perfect ingenuousness"—but even that is not a "truly" wink, it is only one performed to put the reader on good terms with himself for discovering it.

At bottom, like every real journalist, Mr. Bennett is a good deal of a preacher. At the end of a brief chapter on the state of mind induced by living at the top of a mountain, he delivers a little sermon which strikes sharply at all of us who isolate ourselves on mountain tops—a sermon which has an application at least as keen in America as in England:

> When I hear a man say, when I hear myself say, "I'm sick of politics," I always think, "What you want is six months in prison, or in a slum, or in a mine, or in a bakehouse, or in the skin of a woman. After that, we should see if you were sick of politics." And when I hear a lot of people together say that they are sick of politics, then I am quite sure that politics are more than ever urgently in need of attention. It is at such moments that a man has an excellent opportunity of showing that he is a man.

MILLIONS IN THE WAY

DAVE'S DAUGHTER. By Patience Bevier Cole. Frederick A. Stokes Company. $1.

Dave's daughter was the possessor of several millions in coin of the realm. But all these dollars were very much in the way. She didn't care about them, and they were irritating to the pride of a young man who continued to live in the mining country of the Northwest. The young woman, whose wings had been so thoroughly and so undesirably gilded by her father, now dead, is flying a triumphant course at the beginning of the story, through the select of New York society, and having her picture published and her dresses described in the New York papers. Her aunt has succeeded in engaging her to a member of the most exclusive of Knickerbocker families. And in consequence of it all the girl is very unhappy. Two little old maid dressmakers in a Long Island village become deeply interested in her, and by their determined efforts finally set things right, even to the pride of the stiff-necked young man in the West. The elements of the tale have been known to fiction years without number. But it is written with sprightliness, with some ingenuity in the contriving and arrangement of its happenings, and with a certain refinement of touch that indicates better possibilities in the author when she shall have learned to get her inspiration from life rather than from books.

EXCELLENT TRIFLES

Mr. Lucas's Sketches of London Past and Present

LOITERER'S HARVEST. By E. V. Lucas. The Macmillan Company. $1.25.

THERE is no taking E. V. Lucas half-heartedly. Either you light your pipe and read on until you have reached the final tailpiece or else you do not take to him at all. If it happens to be "Loiterer's Harvest" that falls into your hands the chances are that you will light your pipe and read on to the end. You will be fascinated even if you are not a loiterer.

The harvest he garners is a slight sheaf of trifles, essays on London past and present; on Thackeray at the punch table; on the poetry of Patrick D. Chambers, author of that gem of light verse, "Little Lady Loved of Pan;" on various and sundry artists, on a Bologna hotelkeeper, on the works of George Morrow, on masters at cricket and billiards, on Genée and Pavlowa, and a host of wayside posies, including everything from a classic description of a tattooed "lady" to an eminently justifiable attack on the recent inane translation of that joy of youth, "Slovenly Peter." To steal a little charm from the book, this on the tattooed "lady," who had been exhibiting her charms to a mob of "bottomdogs" in front of a cheap London music hall:

> But it was not the tattooing that was interesting; it was herself. She was so utterly a machine—so detached and disinterested and, as I say, mirthless, her wistful, sophisticated eyes never lighting to her tongue and never caring to investigate a single spectator's face. Years of public exhibition, together with the facetious or familiar comments of certain units of the many knots before her, had done their work, and me to her were men in a special sense of the word. I will not say enemies, but necessary evils; foolish, inquisitive creatures who had got to be kept their distance, and, while entertained, repelled. Watching her one had the feeling that by far she was the best thing there.

Mr. Lucas has the enviable gift of making much out of very little. Let him stumble on some utterly banal "Ladies' Oasis," those boudoir handbooks published during the worst part of "the black walnut period," and his whimsically charming appreciation will set you rummaging for just such a volume at the very next second-hand book shop you pass. Or again, a mere phrase will start his pen a-scratching. For example, he finds a Japanese account of a fight. It is just like any fledcuff the world over, the give and take of our day, the impact of fists against flesh. You wonder what ever made Mr. Lucas choose such a commonplace thing to write about, when suddenly in his quotation you read that the Lord of Boshu "missed unexpectedly his cogitation," and is floored both metaphorically and actually. To miss unexpectedly one's cogitation in a fight is too tempting a phrase for Mr. Lucas to neglect.

Perhaps the most diverting paper in the volume is that entitled "Insulence." Mr. Lucas confesses that he coined the word from the two words "insular" and "insolence," both of them weaknesses he professes to see in his fellow-countrymen. The reader, who agrees with him and who can always recall at least one Britisher of his acquaintance who is both insolent and insular, settles in his chair to enjoy the diatribe. At the third paragraph "insolence" turns out to be golfing manners! But you read on, undismayed at the sudden turn of the essay, for Mr. Lucas, too, is laughing with you at the way his pen suddenly took to straying across the links. The light touch, the lack of the controversial, the wholesomeness of the essays of which "Insulence" is an example, makes you loiter through every phrase of "Loiterer's Harvest."

A POET OF NATURE

THE MOUNTAINS ABOUT WILLIAMSTOWN. By George Lansing Raymond. With an introduction by Marion Mills Miller. Illustrated. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.

Mr. Raymond has brought the tributes of his muse in praise of the scenes of mountain and vale round about his Alma Mater, Williams College. The book, which is in format and general style rather a unique production, contains half a dozen long poems in blank verse which tell of nature's beauties in the region which is the author's theme and their influence upon those who live among them. They show a keen ear for rhythm, felicity of phrase, exquisite taste, a polished style, and often exalted feeling. Mr. Raymond's students during the many years when he taught the principles of aesthetic criticism in Williams College and in Princeton and George Washington Universities, and those who have read his books upon the principles that underlie art, poetry, and music, will be interested in this clothing in concrete form of his poetic theories and methods. Dr. Miller, who as pupil and fellow-worker has been closely associated with Mr. Raymond, makes in his "Introduction" a long and lucid discussion of those theories and methods.

The full-page illustrations, from photographs, number thirty or more, and show scenes in the mountains round about and in the campus of Williams College.

The Big Autumn Travel Book

Across Unknown South America

By A. HENRY SAVAGE-LANDOR

Author of "In the Forbidden Land," "An Explorer's Adventures in Tibet," Etc.

LOST to the world for eighteen months, Mr. Savage-Landor penetrated a vast unexplored region of Brazil, Peru, Bolivia, Chili and the Argentine, covering a total distance of 13,750 miles. In this remote wilderness he experienced some of the strangest adventures that ever fell to lot of explorer. A work that adds materially to our knowledge of South America.

The New York Times says:

"Mr. A. Henry Savage-Landor's account of his perilous journey through the wilds of South America, from ocean to ocean, in which he travelled altogether 13,750 miles, is the most thrilling tale of adventure he has yet told. It is a brave and thrilling story told simply, in a manly and unaffected way."

TOPICS OF THE WEEK

MR. W. D. HOWELLS does himself less than justice in his Easy Chair of Harper's Magazine for December when he says:

> For one lovely essay of Lamb's, or wise one of Emerson's, there shall be Easy Chair papers like this without end, where the writer dimly gropes his way from thought to thought, which may no more be real thoughts than the markings on Mars are veritable canals and pumping stations.

The subject of his thoughts this month is the possibility of life on other planets, and he represents himself as a convert to the theory set forth by ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE in "Man's Place in the Universe," and recently reiterated with vigor by Prof. MAUNDER in "Are the Planets Inhabited?" that there is no life in any part of the solar system, at least, except on this earth. A convert, but obviously an unwilling one, who would rather believe that Mars is peopled by a race of highly intelligent beings than accept the teaching of these scientific destroyers of agreeable beliefs. Do they really destroy other persons' belief in the inhabitants of other planets? Prof. LOWELL of Flagstaff is as sure as ever that Mars is peopled, and he is no mere dreamer whose theories are founded on imaginings, but a zealous practical astronomer. But though Mr. HOWELLS affects to accept the conclusions of WALLACE and MAUNDER, he sets forth clearly all the reasonable arguments against them, the chief being the enormous waste in space. This waste, however, Mr. HOWELLS has no trouble in finding reflected in our life on this planet, of whose surface we poor humans occupy so insignificant a part, and he carries his comparison to the products of human art, architecture, and literature in which millions of failures are offset by one perfect achievement, one beautiful thing atones for a myriad of ugly things. Hence he evolves a little essay worthy of its place, and certainly too suggestive and readable to deserve his own slighting description of it.

THE completion of the Tudor Shakespeare, with a fortieth volume by the general editors, Profs. W. A. NEILSON and A. H. THORNDIKE, entitled "The Facts About Shakespeare," is a literary incident worth recording. All the editors of this edition are American scholars, and there are thirty-eight of them, besides the general editors. The introductions and notes contain the results of the latest scholarship, while the volumes are of pocket size, and the typography is entirely satisfactory. In the last volume there is all that is known of the man who wrote the plays and poems, and it is enough. An account of the time in which he lived and the influences which inspired him, a record of biographical facts and traditions, the evidences of his authorship, and a study of the Elizabethan drama are accompanied by a list of all SHAKESPEARE'S personages, a bibliography, and an index. The question of authenticity is considered, and the case of the Baconians clearly stated. Of course, the carper might find a few errors. That is always easy. In that part of the bibliography relating to the stage history of the plays, for instance, no mention is made of IRELAND'S painstaking and invaluable "Records of the New York Stage," though such works as SELHEIMER'S books made up of gleanings from old newspapers and a "History of the New York Stage," by one "J. S. BROWN," are commended to the student. But these are trifles, and the uniform excellence of the editing of the plays and poems and the completeness of the edition are facts of more importance.

SIR FREDERICK COWEN, the famous English musician, renowned alike as composer and as virtuoso, has just published his reminiscences under the title of "My Art and My Friends," in which, however, he dwells less on himself and his achievements, which have been noteworthy, than on the characteristics of the people he has known. COWEN was an infant prodigy in music, who wrote, composed, and performed in an operetta at the age of 8, and made his first professional appearance as a pianist at the age of 11; but he does not make as much of those interesting facts as of the queer idiosyncrasies, for example, of TITIENS, who, in singing "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from WEBER'S "Oberon," would not hesitate to cut the best part of it, and when singing one Arditi waltz at a concert would as likely as not diverge into another, placing a terrible responsibility on her accompanist. TREBELLI, it seems, had a passion for decorated dinner plates, which she would secretly convey from hotel dining rooms to her chamber and hide among her luggage. COWEN has composed operas, symphonies, and oratorios, but his song called "The Better Land," written for ANTOINETTE STERLING, has been, he says, his Frankenstein monster, pursuing him all his mature years. He sold this outright for $1,500, but he never parted with the composer's rights to "The Promise of Life," of which more than a quarter of a million copies have been sold. So that he did not need to write a book to piece out his income, and this has few of the qualities of the pot-boiler.

THE Holiday Number of THE NEW YORK TIMES REVIEW OF BOOKS, to be brought out next Sunday in order to be early in the field with its extraordinary list of the 100 best books of the year, carefully selected by Prof. JOHN ERSKINE, Dr. H. R. STEEVES, and Dr. CARL VAN DOREN of the Department of English in Columbia University, will be a publication of unique interest surpassing any previous special number we have had. It will be printed on extra fine paper, stitched and illustrated, and the "best books," in his list which will be prefaced by an explanatory article by Prof. ERSKINE, will be described by competent reviewers. Four noteworthy articles by Dr. C. B. DAVENPORT, ELLEN GLASGOW, the famous novelist; ALGERNON LEE, and HENRY MILLS ALDEN, editor of Harper's Magazine, chosen as foremost experts in biology, feminism, Socialism, and psychics, will treat of the books of the year which the writers consider best on the subjects of eugenics, woman suffrage, collectivism, and the theory of the survival of the human consciousness after death. These will be the chief features, but there will be many other contributions from writers of note on subjects germane to the occasion, while special attention will be paid to the gift books and richly illustrated books of the season, and to a list of books recently published which are thought to be well suited to the requirements of holiday buyers.

GOOD WHISTLER STORIES

WHISTLER STORIES. Collected and Arranged by Don C. Seitz. Harper & Brothers. New York, 1913.

THIS tiny volume will fit neatly into the pocket of many a Whistler worshipper, and we can hear in advance, the anecdotes which it contains, both old and new, being read aloud to the worshipper's friends. Mr. Seitz, equipped with his excellently humorous sense, has garnered intelligently from the great mass of Whistler literature with which he is familiar, and has sketched in by means of whimsical anecdote and stray bits of conversation, a suggestive portrait of the eccentric artist. The well-known clash with Mr George Moore brought forth many absurdities which Mr. Seitz reprints, not the least absurd being the correspondence ensuing on the offended artist's challenge to a duel, which Mr. Moore refused on the soothing ground that Mr. Whistler was too old a gentleman and would be sadly worsted. The sequel of the duel farce was a happy play of Moore's upon Whistler's famous mot, when some one ranked him with Velasquez, "Why drag in Velasquez?"

> The two foregathered at the same atelier one Sunday afternoon. They nearly collided in entering, but Moore was the first inside. The hostess heard sounds from the hall something between china-breaking and the stamping of hoofs. She went out, to find James in a mighty rage.
> "Dear me!" said the lady, "what is the matter, dear master?"
> "Whistler won't come in! Whistler won't stay under the same roof with that wild Irishman."
> Moore, in the inside, remarked in his sweetly modulated voice, "Why drag in Whistler?"

The persiflage, not always as airy as could be wished, which developed from Whistler's relations with Oscar Wilde, is skimmed for a few of the choicest bits, including the memorable one in which Whistler, walking up to Du Maurier and Wilde at the time the former was portraying the Postlethwaites in Punch, asked: "I say, which one of you invented the other, eh?"

Whistler's early days at West Point furnish several amusing flashes of his eccentricity; he was always enthusiatic in his reminiscences of what he called "West Point in America," but the memories must have been somewhat mellowed with the years, for the observations of his instructors tell a different story. There are many well-known contributors to this selected store of anecdotes—Mark Twain, Henry Labouchère, William M. Chase, Sir John Millais, Will H. Low, and a score of others. One of the most characteristic conversations with the great artist is reported by Frederic Keppel.

> Mr. Keppel first called upon the artist at the Tite Street studio, where the famous portrait of Sarasate, "black on black," stood at the end of the long corridor that he used to form a vista for proper perspective of his work. Laying his hand on Keppel's shoulder, he said:
> "Now, isn't it beautiful?"
> "It certainly is," was the reply.
> "No," said he, "but isn't it beautiful?"
> "It is, indeed," said Keppel.
> Whistler raised his voice to a scream.
> "Damn it, man!" he piped, "isn't it BEAUTIFUL?"
> Adopting the emphasis, Mr. Keppel shouted:
> "Damn it, it is!"
> This was satisfactory.

IN A FEW WORDS

HELEN PARRY EDEN, whose "Bread and Circuses" has just been published, is the daughter of the famous Judge Parry of London.

John A. Moroso, whose novel "The Quarry" is being dramatized, contributes to the Christmas number of The American Magazine a story, "Miracle Mary." A scenario of "Miracle Mary" has already been written, and it will appear in Christmas week as a moving picture drama.

Mrs. Philip Lewisohn has translated Rudolph Herzog's "Leben's Lieder" into English. It will appear in a few weeks under the title "The Story of Helga."

Mrs. Tryphosa Bates Batcheller has returned from an extensive tour of Europe, during which she was received at several courts. Her "Royal Spain of To-day" is soon to appear.

Among the items on the programme of the Christmas Festival of the MacDowell Club, to be held at the Astor Dec. 16, are a poem by Percy MacKaye and "Rada," a play by Alfred Noyes.

Julie M. Lippmann's "Martha by the Day," is in its tenth edition, and its sequel, "Making Over Martha," which has been out only five weeks, is in its third.

Tolstoy's daughter, Tatiana Sankhotine, writes that Bolton Hall's popularisation of "On Life" has been retranslated into Russian without Tolstoy's name, and has had much success.

Sophie Jewett, author of "God's Troubadour" and compiler of "Folk-Ballads of Southern Europe," is Associate Professor of English Literature at Wellesley College.

Walter Winans, whose "Animal Sculpture: Suggestions for Greater Realism in Modelling," was published last week, is a distinguished marksman as well as a sculptor, who has won prizes at Stockholm, Milan, Barcelona, and Paris.

Graham Taylor, who wrote "Religion in Social Action," is resident Warden of the Chicago Commons Social Settlement and Professor of Sociology in the Chicago Tocological Seminary.

Hugh Walpole, the novelist, is directly descended from Sir Robert Walpole.

Estelle Stead, whose biography of her distinguished father is to be published this week, is visiting New York City.

Canon Hannay, better known as "George A. Birmingham," returned to New York Friday after a tour of the Middle West, during which he lectured in Chicago and Indianapolis.

Charles Leonard Stuart has temporarily given up philosophy and poetry for the drama. His comic operetta "Newark Knows How; or, The Suffragette," was produced in Newark last Wednesday and Thureday.

Dr. Thomas O'Hagan has returned to the United States after an extensive tour of Europe. He contributes an illustrated article on "Catholic Journalists and Journalism" to the current issus of The Rosary Magazine.

Because of his services to Spanish literature, Thomas Walsh has been elected a member of the Academy of Seville.

Jane Edgerton Hovey's new book is meant especially for those who like children and dogs. It is called "John o' Partletts."

Roman Life

Mrs. Anne C. E. Allinson's "Roads from Rome" is a series of sketches about the men and women of the Imperial City whose underlying purpose is to show that "the roads from Rome lead into the highway of human life." The author endeavors to present historical personalities in such a way as to show them to be a part of the same humanity as ourselves. Three of the six sketches deal with men and women and social life during the Augustan Age—the time of one is laid in the latter years of Julius Caesar, another in the time of Pliny, and the last is concerned with Hadrian's attempt to revivify Greek art in Athens. HARVARD'S STORY

Entertaining Record of a Great University

THE STORY OF HARVARD. By Arthur Stanwood Pier. With illustrations by Vernon Howe Bailey. Boston: Little, Brown & Co.

THIS is neither a formal history nor a series of anecdotes, but something between the two. Mr. Pier is in affectionate intimacy with the Harvard of to-day, not only as a "Harvard man," but as having lived since graduation in the neighborhood and atmosphere of the university. And he has evidently taken pains, before setting out to write this pleasant and unpretentious chronicle of Harvard, to make himself familiar with the original sources of information about the early years of the college. There have been histories of Harvard by Benjamin Pierce, Josiah Quincy, Prof. Peabody, and W. R. Thayer, and Mr. Pier does not profess to have discovered any facts of importance not covered in those works; but he has dealt skilfully, if modestly, with the old material, and the result is an admirable book of its kind.

Whatever Harvard's standing may be to-day among the other big universities which the country now possesses, she is at least a national relic of importance. Her age, as a university in the proper sense of the term, is as inconsiderable as that of its rivals. But, as an entity of a sort, it has its roots deeper in the past. The original Harvard College was a small and quaint affair. It was only six years after the settlement of Boston that the General Court of Massachusetts Bay Colony voted £400, the equivalent in our money of some $15,000, for the founding of a public school or college. Two years later John Harvard, a young parson not long out of Cambridge University, who had come over to see the New World before dying of consumption, left double that amount for the same purpose. Other gifts and bequests began to come in, commodities for the most part—anything, from a sheep to a sugar-spoon. Massachusetts would do what she could for her sons. A building was put up and the college was started. But it was handicapped at the outset by more than the rude physical conditions of its existence. The first officially appointed head of the college, (Mr. Pier makes something of the fact that he did not bear the title of President,) the Rev. Nathaniel Eaton, seems to have been a thorough-paced rascal. He was a thief and a bully, robbed the students and beat them—and was at length dismissed from the college and the Church, and left the colony. The first titular President, the Rev. Henry Dunster, was elected in 1640—a devoted and useful man, who felt constrained to resign after fourteen years because he had doubts as to the validity of infant baptism!

There were nine members of the first graduating class, the class of 1642. Most of them entered the ministry. Several of the most brilliant returned to England. One, George Downing, found a career there far more lively than the ministry—became the "Sir G. Downing" mentioned several times by Pepys—now as a "perfidious rogue" and now as "active and a man of business" and well fitted, therefore, to become a Secretary of the Treasury to the gay Charles. In old age he gave some money to the provincial college of his youth.

Preparation for the ministry was, of course, the prime object of the college. To enter, the candidate had to be able to read Latin at sight and "to make and speake true Latine in prose and verse," also to know something of Greek grammar. Hebrew, Chaldee, and Syriac were prescribed studies as well as Latin and Greek. The other sujects were logic, ethics, arithmetic, geometry, physics, metaphysics, politics, and divinity. This was in the middle of the seventeenth century, but even in the middle of the nineteenth the curriculum was not much broader, though, of course, it was covered with far greater thoroughness.

The college had some of its darkest days during the Revolution. In 1769 the General Court abandoned the State House, over which the British Government had stationed a military guard, and toward whose doors cannon were pointed—and took possession of Harvard College. For the next few years the college work was carried on with the greatest difficulty. The students were human, and preferred listening to debates and joining in patriotic demonstrations to the humdrum round of study. Finally, after Lexington, when Cambridge became a centre for the militia assembling for the siege of Boston, the students were sent home, and even the pretense of carrying on the college routine was abandoned for more than a year. Several of the buildings were used as barracks; officers were quartered in the President's house, and when finally college reopened, a good deal of damage had been done, which the General Court failed to pay for. But a greater embarrassment was due to the conduct of a single person. This was none other than John Hancock, the gallant and wealthy Hancock, the most popular man in Massachusetts. In an hour of enthusiasm he had been made Treasurer of the college. He accepted the office, but neglected its duties. After a year or so the corporation of the college asked him for his accounts, but he refused either to make a statement or to allow the books and papers to be examined. When he was elected President of the Continental Congress, the college authorities ventured to hint that he might wish to be released from his office as Treasurer: "He would not take the hint. Instead, in May, 1776, he proceeded to take an amazing step; he had all the papers, bonds, and notes of the college brought from Cambridge and delivered to him at Philadelphia." After getting these safely into his possession, he declined more firmly than ever to make a settlement. Ten years later, after he had been five times Governor of Massachusetts, Hancock did make a statement to the effect that he owed the college £1,054. It was only recovered some years after his death, when his heirs paid the principal, but refused to pay any interest. A strange episode, altogether.

As for the nineteenth century Harvard, Mr. Pier throws more emphasis on the student life and customs than upon the educational part of Harvard's story. In the early decades of the century the boys were wretchedly housed and fed, but their facilities for getting drunk seem to have been uncommonly good, and must have gone far toward making up for their other privations. Going to the theatre involved a fine of $10, but there appears to have been no penalty for the bibulous. At commencement everybody got drunk as a matter of course. There were convivial clubs and private jamborees were common. As late as 1844 we find Francis Parkman, destined to be the hero of the Oregon Trail, jauntily recording in a letter one such function:

> Joe got up one of his old-fashioned suppers, on a scale of double magnificence, inviting thereunto every specimen of the Class of 1844 that lingered within an accessible distance. * * * The spree was worthy of the entertainment. None got drunk, but all got jolly; and Joe's champagne disappeared first; then his Madeira; then his whisky punch would have followed suit, if its copious supplies had not prevented. * * * The whole ended with smashing a dozen bottles against the Washington elm, and a war-dance with scalp yells in the middle of the common, in the course of which several night-capped heads appeared at the open windows of the astonished neighbors.

The closing chapters of the book, which have to do with undergraduate life at the Harvard of to-day, involve, though they do not conspicuously emphasize, a sharp contrast between past and present. Harvard in 1913 is not a mere development of the Harvard of Emerson's day, or of Lowell's. It bears somewhat the same relation to it that the latest sea-going hotel bears to a sailing clipper of the earlier days. At Amherst or Williamstown rather than at Cambridge or New Haven may now be found the sort of life and the sort of training upon which the fame of Harvard and Yale was based.

"LEFT-HANDED BUSINESS"

WALLINGFORD AND BLACKIE DAW. By George Randolph Chester. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $1.

The same old Wallingford and Daw, only a little more so, greet the readers of this chronicle of what its publishers describe as "left-handed business." They are just the same shrewd and audacious scamps that they were in the beginning, but operating upon a bigger basis and with even more reckless confidence in themselves. They are equal partners now, although Blackie still maintains his attitude of administration for the other's more Napoleonic genius in the evolution of swindling schemes. As they march along their triumphant way, upon which fails not even the shadow of the hand of the law, they take in and deprive of plentiful dollars not only every new sucker that comes within their reach but also many they have formerly fleeced. These amiable victims come back to eat out of their hands and be fleeced again as fearlessly as if experience had taught them nothing. The story moves more slowly than is usually the case with Chester's tales and with more elaboration of incident and of dialogue. By consequence, its entertaining quality is lessened a good deal. For your picaresque novel must go swiftly and gayly, with no slowing down for unnecessary talk, or it is likely to become wearisome.

BOOKS ON ARCHITECTURE AND THE FINE ARTS A SPECIAL FEATURE OF THE NEW SCRIBNER BOOKSTORE, ON FIFTH AVE. AT 48TH ST.

¶ From the exhibition gallery for pictures and rare books at the rear of the store, a stairway leads up to another gallery which runs down the side of the store, and widens at the upper end.

¶ In this clear, wide space are arranged those large collections of works relating to art for which the store is noted. And one of the most interesting of these is that of architectural books, recently widened to such scope that no student of the subject can wisely neglect it.

THE VALLEY OF THE MOON

By JACK LONDON,
Author of "Burning Daylight," "Martin Eden," "The Sea Wolf," etc.

One of Many Opinions.

"This new novel of Mr. London's is, first of all, new evidence of the range of his talent and of his assured mastery of his craft.

"We have him here for a while again as the insurgent against social and economic injustice.

"But if he breathes revolt and revolution for a while, he points to a more peaceful end and an easier way out for the submerged.

"For those of them, at least, in whom poverty has not killed the energy to be up and doing.

"Through it all there is woven as winning, as genuine an idyl of young love, of mutual trust and helpfulness, of but a single, united aim in life as one can desire.

"The book is American to the core. It is picturesque and wholesome, romantic and yet practical, breathing, best of all, the atmosphere of the open that heals and brings contentment and the renewed will to live."—New York Tribune.

PUTNAM'S NEW BOOKS

Little Stories by Big Men

Compiled by ANNABEL LEE

12°. $1.25 net. By mail, $1.40.

The volume contains stories and anecdotes from the pen of practically every man conspicuous in the affairs of the nation and of not a few foreign celebrities. The stories are published with the full approval of the men with whose names they are associated, and should prove amusing not only to readers of the present generation, but also of permanent interest as characteristic utterances, in lighter mood, of those upon whom rest, in their workaday hours, the burdens of the nations.

Animal Sculpture

Suggestions for Greater Realism in Modeling

By WALTER WINANS

Gold Medallist for Sculpture, Fifth Olympiad, Stockholm, 1912. Grand Prix for Sculpture, Milan, 1912. Grand Prix for Sculpture, Barcelona, 1912. Silver Medal for Sculpture, Paris, 1900.

8°. 20 Illustrations. $1.75 net. By mail, $1.90.

Although perhaps better known as a rifle and revolver shot and as the author of many informing books on different kinds of shooting, Mr. Winans is a sculptor of distinction, having been awarded gold and silver medals for his statues of horses. In the present volume Mr. Winans reproduces illustrations of many familiar masterpieces of animal sculpture, showing that many of them, although superficially effective, are marred by serious faults of conception and execution.

The Story of the World

By ELIZABETH O'NEILL

Author of "A Nursery History of England."

8°. Profusely illustrated in color and black and white. $2.50 net. By mail, $2.75.

The reader who peruses its five hundred-odd pages will lay the foundations of an historic knowledge on which he may safely build during the subsequent years. Beginning with the earliest records of history, the author gives an account of the chief events that have influenced the destinies of nations and depicts the spirit of different peoples and times. Not a corner of the world that has affected history is neglected in this embracing, thorough, well-proportioned, and entertainingly presented history of all times and all peoples.

Fanny of the Forty Frocks

By Frances Aymar Mathews

A striking story of a winsome American girl enmeshed in a great diplomatic scandal; a story of the keen battle of wits and machiavellian methods of two notable European diplomats—a battle for supremacy and for the girl. "Rich in surprises, and leaves one with the conviction that Fanny is one of the daintiest, cleverest and most lovable heroines who has lived between book covers in many a day."—Albany Times-Union.

CURRENT FICTION

Books by George A. Birmingham, Jeffery Farnol, S. F. Whitman and Others

GENERAL JOHN REGAN. By G. A. Birmingham. George H. Doran Company. $1 20 net.

WHEN Lewis Carroll made the verb "to chortle" a part of the English language he rendered a service to the entire Anglo-Saxon race, and especially to those members of it who may chance to be called upon to describe the novels of that writer who chooses to be known as "G. A. Birmingham." What other word could possibly express the effect produced by, for instance, this new story, "General John Regan"! The fortunate person to whom the village of Ballymoy—where J. J. Weldon sought "Spanish Gold" and later became involved in "The Simpkins Plot"—is already familiar ground, opens the book expecting to chortle over it—and does; as for other people, if they find themselves imperious to the humor of this tale of Dr. Lucius O'Grady's manoeuvres to the affair of the statue to General John Regan—well, the wisest thing for them to do would be to summon their family physician as quickly as possible.

Into the quiet little Irish village of Ballymoy, on a certain hot and drowsy afternoon, there comes a motor car—a large and powerful motor car, proclaiming as with a trumpet the wealth of its owner. That owner proves to be, not the Lord Lieutenant, as Thaddeus Gallagher suggested, nor "one of the bosses of the Congested Districts Board," which was Constable Moriarty's idea, but an American, Horace P. Billing by name. Mr Billing promptly declares that Ballymoy needs waking up, inquires the whereabouts of General John Regan's statue, and is deeply shocked at discovering that no such statue exists. The inhabitants of Ballymoy, though this is the very first time they have heard of the General, do the best they can under the able leadership of Dr. Lucius O'Grady—who was, we suspect, closely related to both J. J. and Dr. Whitty—to gratify Mr. Billing by showing him the birthplace of his favorite hero, and introducing him to the only surviving member of General John Regan's family; whereupon Mr. Billing insists that it is their duty to erect a statue to that famous warrior with the utmost rapidity, and offers to subscribe $100 to a fund for the purpose. The extraordinary complications which precede the triumph of that master of explanations, Dr. Lucius O'Grady, make up the book.

There are persons with whom no sensible individual would willingly argue because of their remarkable ability for turning black into white, scarlet or pea green, as they may prefer, and one of these persons is Dr. O'Grady. He was never at a loss for an explanation, and he could explain the same thing in as many different ways as there were people whom he wished to convince. Our old friend Major Kent, that upright and exceedingly British gentleman, made constant objections to the doctor's schemes, and even tried to discuss some of them, but he was always out-talked, if seldom converted. Father McCormack, on the other hand, agreed with nearly everything the doctor said; but then Father McCormack, so long as their remarks did not touch on his profession or his aversion to Sunday newspapers, agreed with nearly everything everybody said. It is a long time since we have read anything half so funny as the scene of the committee meeting, where Dr. O'Grady, Father McCormack, Mr. Doyle, the innkeeper; Major Kent, stanch Unionist, and Thady Gallacher, editor of The Connacht Advocate and ardent Home Ruler—he was willing to make a speech upon the subject at any hour of the day or night—discuss the proposed statue of General John Regan, their debate being further complicated by the sudden appearance of Mrs. Greer, wife of the District Inspector of Police; the details of Mary Ellen's costume, and the earnest efforts of young Kerrigan, the butcher's son, to play "Rule, Britannia" on his cornet—the tune being one with which he had a very slight acquaintance.

But no difficulties about politics, music, or even female dress could daunt the gallant spirit of Dr. Lucius O'Grady. Did he not cause Lord Alfred Blakeney to make a speech on the great occasion, despite that unhappy young man's vehement objections? Which success was nevertheless but a small one compared with his achievement in regard to Mrs. Ford, the lady who had such an overmastering fondness for "plain speaking."

Mr. Birmingham is that rare thing, a genuine humorist, and one whose wit is as clean and good-tempered as it is fresh and sparkling; he pours it forth without apparent effort, as though it flowed from an inexhaustible fountain. His books can do more for the jaded and the weary than oceans of tonics and tons of advice. "General John Regan" is in truth a public benefactor.

KENTUCKY'S MOUNTAINEERS

MOTHERING ON PERILOUS. By Lucy Furman. The Macmillan Company. $1.50 net.

"Mothering on Perilous" is the diary of a missionary teacher to the mountain whites of Kentucky. The school is situated on Perilous Creek, so named because of its treacherous quicksands. A heartsick girl, "whom death has robbed of everything," even the "very reason for existence," turns to the settlement work in the mountains of her own State, hoping to find some "way of filling in the lonely, dreaded years ahead." What she found, and how full and rich her life became, her book tells with eloquent simplicity. It is to be hoped that this simplicity will not blind its readers to—we had almost written—the real greatness of the author's achievement.

She tells a story absorbing in its interest, just by jotting down the doings and happenings which concern the twelve small boys whom she undertakes to "mother." They are placed before us "in the rough," with none of the idealization which is itself a quicksand to many who write of missionary work. Little savages are they, every one, fighting, cursing, drinking abhorring soap and water, absolutely wrong in their ideals. Yet their teacher not only sees fine possibilities and loves her unruly flock, but she makes us see as she sees and love her boys ourselves. She believes in the tradition of their descent from sturdy, unmixed Anglo-Saxon stock and she respects their inherited qualities of courage, honesty, hospitality, endurance, and family loyalty. She writes, too, without a trace of cant. This is not a "pious book," though its author's Christian spirit shines through it; she manages her boys with consummate tact, leading them very gently toward her own standards, not attempting to quell the fighting spirit but to divert it from feuds to the large field of patriotism. She avoids the temptation of representing her boys, or any of them, as romantically devoted to her or becoming readily converted to her teachings. In short, she leaves them as she finds them, "human boys," though evidently responding, little by little, to her sane and steady influence, and learning to love the "quare woman" herself.

The book holds no romance, save a childish one. Unlike "the Lady of the Decoration," the young teacher finds her pupils enough to fill heart as well as hands. A family feud supplies the exciting episode of the diary, and is related with the author's wise detachment and comprehensive sympathy. She has shown herself into the life of these people; she understands their point of view, and she and her readers never for a moment part company. She takes us with her at every step, charming us with her humor, as she wins our affection by her warm humanity. Her style is graceful and clear, and her fascinating narrative cannot fail to widen the horizon of her readers in more ways than one. A lovely feature of her story is its self-unconsciousness, so rare in autobiographical sketches. Her object is to portray the people she loves, and she goes about it as simply, as free from pose, as did Dinah Morris when she preached upon the village green, with the result of a book as limpid, as refreshing, as invigorating as a mountain stream itself.

JOLLY SAILORMEN

THE HAPPY SHIP. By Stephen French Whitman. McBride, Nast & Co. $1.25 net.

It is dangerous to court comparison with Privates Mulvaney, Ortheris, and Learoyd, as do the sailormen Patrick and Shorty of "The Happy Ship," Oklahoma—not the real Oklahoma, by the bye, but imagined and christened before the new battleship was born.

At Coney Island the unnamed narrator of the tales first encounters these nautical friends, and at Coney Island, some years after, he bids them farewell, often meeting them meanwhile and hearing from their lips racy recitals of exploit and adventure on sea and shore. It is, perhaps, unavoidable that there should be a strong Kiplingesque flavor in these stories, which would be more thoroughly enjoyable if, as we read, the "Soldiers Three" did not insistently claim our reminiscent delight. They are, however, good, rollicking, clever tales, admirable in their local color, especially when that is Oriental, with here and there such clear-eyed bits of observation that one wishes there were more of them. If the publisher's promise of making the readers "laugh aloud" is not quite fulfilled, at least it is a jolly book, living well up to its title.

A DETECTIVE STORY

THE WIDOW'S NECKLACE. By Ernest Davies. The Devin-Adair Company.

The detective story, like the poor, we have always with us, and sorely put to it are the writers thereof to contrive variants upon the well-worn theme. In Arsène Lupin we have the burglar-detective, while "The Widow's Necklace" gives the still more startling—but we must not betray the secret.

During a house party in an old Scotch mansion a valuable necklace disappears during the night from the room in which its owner lies sleeping. As usual, the accredited detective is foiled in his search; and, as usual, the amateur succeeds. In this case an American and his wife ingeniously trace the robbery—again as usual—to the most improbable person. Up to this point the story takes us with it. The plot is carefully thought out, its intricacies well managed; the characters are clearly drawn, the dialogue lively. In his effort, however, to make the conclusion wholly unlike any other of its kind the author overdoes the surprise, and seems almost to break faith with the readers whose interest he has engaged. The finale is not an outgrowth of the tale, and it spoils what comes near to being a very cleverly contrived story.

MR. FARNOL'S "TAWNISH"

THE HONOURABLE MR. TAWNISH. By Jeffery Farnol. Little, Brown & Co. $1 net.

Sir John Chester's pretty daughter Penelope had three enthusiastic and devoted admirers—her father and his two old friends, Bentley and Sir Richard Eden, both of whom had loved her mother, but had been noble enough not to permit that love to break their friendship with the man she chose. It was hard to tell which of the three was most devoted to the child she soon left motherless. It had been planned that "Pen" should marry Bentley's nephew, "but, being young and hot-headed, the very expression of that wish was but the signal for them to set themselves to thwart it even before they had ever seen each other." The young gentleman betook himself abroad and the lady promptly lost her heart to the Honorable Mr. Tawnish, an exquisite of the Piercie Shafton type, and hence peculiarly distasteful to the burly Sir John, who casts his wig into a corner and declares with great oaths that his daughter shall marry a man, "and, damme, I mean a man and not a clothes-horse or a dancing master," no one at all resembling the poetic lover, characterized by the irate father as "a pale-faced, pranked-out, spindle-shanked, mealy mouthed popinjay." The friends, meeting Mr. Tawnish in an inn, agree with him that, like legendary lovers, he shall prove his worthiness of his fair lady by accomplishing three tasks which they shall set. First, he must perform some feat which each of the three shall avow to be beyond him. Second, he must make a public laughing-stock of Sir Harry Rafkes, the most quarrelsome and dangerous bully in the country; and, thirdly, he must succeed in putting Sir John, Sir Richard, and Bentley all "together and at the same time at a disadvantage." Mr. Tawnish, declaring that "the labors of Hercules were scarce to be compared with these," nevertheless jots them down in his memorandum, and, tripping away on his red heels, avers that he "will go and set about the doing of them." Thereupon things begin to happen, and, as is the fashion of Mr. Farnol's stories, they happen right along to a most satisfactory close.

The book is much shorter than Mr. Farnol's former novels, but its literary art is even more marked. Shorn of every superfluous word, the characters and the situations stand out clear cut and brilliant. It is a gem in which it would be hard to find a flaw. And, somehow, we don't know how he does it; it is Mr. Farnol's own trick—writing of prizefighters and rough country squires, of willful maidens and ruffling young blades; sparing of neither oaths nor gore upon occasion, yet he contrives to show human nature's clean and wholesome side, to reveal the beauty of unselfish love, and to leave his readers the nobler for their association with his healthy, simple-hearted characters.

"The Honourable Mr. Tawnish" is admirably illustrated in color by Charles E. Brock, and, as the holly mingling with the crossed swords upon its cover suggests, it touches the festal season sufficiently to give it a right to be numbered among the Christmas books.

Congregationalism

An illustrated volume entitled "The Pilgrim Faith" contains an account of the good works of the Congregationalists of America, written by Osora S. Davis, President of Chicago Theological Seminary. The author writes as a lover of the faith and order of the Congregationalists, and frankly confesses his book is "colored by the enthusiasm of a reporter who rejoices in the heroic achievements of the noble souls whose deeds he records." (Pilgrim Press. $1.)

VIEWS OF READERS

Dr. Johnson on English—The Standard Dictionary

New York Times Review of Books:

THE English language seems to be quite a bone of contention just now, and I notice in a recent issue of THE NEW YORK TIMES Dr. Rossiter Johnson takes up the cudgels in behalf of the United States. Of course he is right in saying that the English expect too much in demanding of us a literature, for we have hitherto been engaged in making money, and making books, as a rule, is the antithesis of making money, except on the racetrack.

But when he undertakes to criticise Macaulay, who was an individual writer, or Ruskin, or even good old Charles Dickens, who was nothing if not of the soil, racy and local, I must take issue with him. When Dickens says: "He quite shook hands with me," he doubtless means that he actually shook hands, figuratively speaking, as against a half-approving attitude of almost shaking hands. I do not recollect the passage, but the word "quite" is very commonly used in England when perhaps some other word might be more grammatical, but not so quaintly expressive.

In the expression "different to" the same rule probably applies as in "analogous to," "similar to," "appropriate to," although I forget the rule. But "differ from" as used by De Quincey is certainly much more correct than "differ with." "With" implies connection: you go with a person, but you part "from" them, and differ implies this parting of opinion.

"More or less," as used by Tennyson, is a perfectly intelligible English expression, meaning "to a greater or less extent." English writers always leave a great deal of latitude for words and phrases "understood," trusting to the intelligence of their readers to supply the deficiency, as long as they are not writing a treatise on grammar, but simply a story-book. That word "understood" impressed itself very strongly on my childish mind and I have never forgotten it.

In Lecky's sentence, "Being incapable of taking an active part in the war, Washington placed him in command at Philadelphia," refers, of course, to the previous sentence which dealt with Arnold, and his name does not need to be repeated.

The sentence in No. 200 of The Spectator is another instance of the preposition "to" being understood, as it is called in England. Matthew Arnold says: "I propose to inquire," which is doubtless exactly what he intended to say, although Dr. Johnson thinks he should have said something else.

"Thackeray's expression "Our foot," to an Englishman conveys the idea of infantry or foot soldiers, and is perfectly intelligible. Carlyle also expressed himself in the manner peculiar to himself, as he intended.

But I might go on forever, and so might Dr. Rossiter Johnson. The fact is this, and explains why it is hard to come to an understanding: In England we speak English; in the United States you talk grammar—some of you, at least; others talk "United States." The great idea here seems to be to tie one down to some rule or system, or method; no spontaneity, no chance for individual expression. Now, if there is one thing an Englishman hates more than another, it is pedantry and schoolmaster English; in fact, he will go out of his way to say something individual, and perchance not in strict accordance with the rules of grammar. So if our English writers do not always come up to the pedagogical standard of the United States, put it down to the fact that they have known English all their lives, and, in fact, speak English without knowing it, and would scorn to refer to Webster or Worcester to see whether or not they are talking correctly. They may be wrong, but they are English, you know.

"The Southerner"

New York Times Review of Books:

Referring to a criticism of "The Southerner," by Thomas Dixon, in a recent issue of THE BOOK REVIEW, I would like, first of all, to say that Mr. Dixon's forsaking of the spoken message for the written one has always puzzled me. Perhaps he found it too ephemeral. As a matter of fact, his books give the impression of dictated speeches handed over in the rough to the publisher. He apparently ignores revisional work, and laughs at the punctilious demands of the pen. Form, style, accuracy, even grammar, if need be, are unconsidered when a message for the world throbs within him for expression. His work is for humanity, and there is not in it one single bid for the critic's approval. From the moment an idea that he considers of large importance strikes him he is a madman and he writes like a madman. As to how well the idea is expressed doesn't seem to concern him in the least. He is so essentially American, consequently so alive and in earnest, that art for art's sake seems to have no place in his endeavors. His pile of wood is cut often with a dull axe and never sawed with a sharp saw. But to me the great, all-important thing about it is that it will live, and that through his books and plays the future American can get virile pictures of American character and American life that must pass and is passing away. To criticise such work as Mr. Dixon's from the literary standpoint is futile—so futile, in fact, that it is beginning to exhaust itself, so that the world is taking what he has to say as he chooses to say it. And there is no resisting him. He sweeps you along with him, and it is only after he has gotten through with you that you denounce yourself for accepting, without comment and with rapacious greed, his crudities and inaccuracies. Genius may take its own way. The merely talented must conform to rules. America, with a few exceptions, has reached only the pioneer stages of literature, any way, and while at times grotesque, Mr. Dixon is one of its strongest and boldest writers.

"The Fate of Felix Brand."

New York Times Review of Books:

The review which you published some weeks ago of the novel "The Fate of Felix Brand," and the letter which appeared a little later concerning the book from one of THE REVIEW'S ever interesting band of "readers" who have "views," led me to read the book, so much did they arouse my curiosity about it. Like the writer of the letter, I, too, puzzled over the question of whether or not Hugh Gordon, sturdy fighter for right conduct that he is, and a little inclined to self-righteousness, is about to commit bigamy when the book ends. It would be a delicate question to settle, and I would like to know whether or not the courts have ever had to decide any similar case.

But the phrase of the book that interested me most was the way in which the author has turned the theme of "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde" face about and made the good in human nature a stronger and more dominating force than the evil. In that respect the story reflects the greater hopefulness for humanity and the stronger faith in man's future of this age than of that in which Stevenson wrote. The story has for me more fascination than does Stevenson's most famous, though, I think, far from best, novel, because it seems so perfectly possible, what might happen to any ordinary person. Stevenson depended upon material, though mysterious, means to bring about the transformation of individuality—"experimental medicine," Mr. Hyde called it. The means is convincing enough in the story, but it is so outside of all ordinary experience as to make it, after all, something apart from life. But the advance in psychological knowledge there has been during the last twenty-five years, and of which Mrs. Kelly has taken advantage, has enabled her to bring the possibility of the same transformation of individuality straight home to every reader of the book. She makes it seem possible that what happened to Felix Brand might happen, and very likely would happen, under similar circumstances, to you or me or anybody. If the preachers want some new way of scaring people into being good, I don't know where they can find a better one than in this unique idea, which Mrs. Kelly has worked out in a story of absorbing interest, of the slow building up in a man's consciousness, by his own thoughts and actions, of two warring individualities, of which one is bound to conquer the other.

May I ask for information upon the authorship of this novel, which has interested me so much? Is the Florence Finch Kelly who writes it the same person as the Mrs. Florence Kelly who has done such valiant work in several States in the campaign against child-labor? D. R. B.

The Standard Dictionary

New York Times Review of Books:

Robed in the purity of his critical ermine, Dr. Joseph Jacobs, in a rich, generous, and sparkling review of the Funk & Wagnalls New Standard Dictionary tells the readers of THE NEW YORK TIMES REVIEW OF BOOKS that Bailey, the first dictionary maker of importance, has been "ungratefully cast overboard" by the editors of the New Standard, thus implying that the great Bailey's name has been omitted from the book. But such is not the case. Nathan, or Nathaniel, as he is sometimes called, Bailey's name is recorded on page 211, column 3, line 42 from top, as an English lexicographer who died June 27, 1742.

Dr. Jacobs, citing "the wise principle laid down by Dr. Funk—the chief function of a dictionary is to record usage," fails afoul of this principle because the New Standard introduces what Dr. Jacobs thinks is an innovation—simplified spelling. Living up to the principle which he himself declares "wise," the editors put it into practice by recording the usage of 50,000 English-speaking people. Dr. Jacobs says he prefers "school" to "scool." So does the New Standard, which records "scool" merely because it is a form used by the 50,000 persons referred to. "School" was spelled "scool" by no less a literary light than John Heywood as long ago as 1546. Shakespeare wrote both "schoole" and "scul," but the New Standard records "school," so why worry? Why get one's "fur up the wrong way"? Simplified spelling is no innovation; it is like the poor—we have it with us always.

Again, Dr. Jacobs says he "never saw 'Esopian' or 'Esopic' spelt (please note the simplified spelling here) with a plain 'E.'" Has Dr. Jacobs, himself a fabulist and folklorist of no mean ability, never seen Thomas Warton's "History of English Poetery"? It was of this work of the laureate that his old friend, Sidney Lee, wrote: "He [Warton] never forgot that he was the historian and not the critic of the literature of which he treated. * * * No literary history discloses more comprehensive learning in classical and foreign literature, as well as in that of Great Britain." Warton, for one, used the form Esopian in this "History" (volume I., diss. 2,) even as the French use Esopique to this day. The form is by no means new, for it antedates the Declaration of Independence and found its way into the dictionaries, where it has remained ever since. But the New Standard here also gives the alternative forms, Aesopian, Aesopic, on page 46, in column 1, and on line 28, so that persons familiar with the classic spelling of the great Greek fabulist's name Aesop need have no difficulty in finding them in alphabetical order.

Dr. Jacobs expresses disappointment at finding Charles Edward Louis Philip Casimir Stuart entered in the New Standard's vocabulary under Stuart instead of under Charles. To have recorded the name under Charles would have been to admit the claim of the Young Pretender to the Jacobite succession, a claim which, except as a sentimental reminiscence, Charles Stuart himself buried thirty years before his death. Just as Oliver Cromwell is recorded under Cromwell and not under Oliver, so Charles Edward Stuart is recorded under his patronymic Stuart.

With the names of characters in fiction the editors endeavored to follow the plan of inserting them under the first name as being the most likely place that they would be sought. This accounts for "Adam Bede" being found under "A"; "David Copperfield" under "D"; "Oliver Twist" under "O," &c. Dr. Jacobs misses the name of Raymond Poincaré from the New Standard vocabulary, although he notes the presence of his cousin's name there. There is a great difference between Senator Poincaré and President Poincaré, and he was elected President only on Jan. 17, 1913, when the editorial work had ended.

As to the practical value of the daily chronological history, there may be differences of opinion. There was a time when Chambers's "Book of Days" found favor with the public, and there is no reason why this should not also. Had Dr. Jacobs looked a little more deeply he would have found that the information supplied in this section is supplemented by the record of historic and other events in the general vocabulary, as he may see by looking under "Act," "Architecture," "Award," "Baptist," "Battle," "Case," "Declaration," &c.

It is remarkable that a man of such depth of erudition, so keen an observer, and so great a master of literary criticism as Dr. Jacobs should have failed to note these things. But, alas, Quandoque bonus dormitat Homerus!

HUNDRED BEST BOOKS OF THE YEAR

The Committee from the Department of English, Columbia University, comprising Prof. John Erskine, Dr. H. R. Steeves, and Dr. Carl Van Doren, has completed its list of The Hundred Best Books of the year. It contains a remarkable view of the important achievements in literature since the 1st of January, and will be published Sunday, Nov. 30, as the leading feature in the Holiday Number of The New York Times Book Review, which will appear as a supplement to the regular edition of The Times. The list will have an introductory article by Prof. Erskine, which will be followed by comprehensive reviews of each of the books chosen.

Another important feature will be a discussion of four Vital Questions of the Day—Eugenics, Socialism, Feminism, and Psychism. Leading authorities on each of these subjects have been asked to review books selected by themselves from the year's publications on these special themes. Thus, Dr. C. B. Davenport, Director of the Station for Experimental Evolution of the Carnegie Institute, will review a book on Eugenics. Ellen Glasgow, the famous novelist, will review a book on Feminism. Algernon Lee, President of the Rand School of Social Science, will review a book on Socialism. Henry M. Alden, Editor of Harper's Magazine, will review a book discussing the possibility of life after death.

There will be additional contributions from well-known authors of the day, such as Mary S. Watts, Theodore Dreiser, Coningsby Dawson, Jules Guerin and many others who will write on various entertaining and instructive features of the literature of the day.

Of particular importance to the buyers of Christmas books will be the carefully annotated list of the season's gift books. This list has been prepared for the special purpose of answering the question, "What is the most suitable book for a Christmas gift?" and will furnish an admirable guide to the holiday buyer.

This Special Holiday Number of The New York Times Book Review will have an actual net paid sale of over 200,000 copies. It will contain 64 pages and will be illustrated throughout.

BOOKS FOR BOYS

Increasing Numbers as the Holiday Season Draws Near

MORE books for boys. There are always books for boys and then some. Why is it? Well, the reviewer of these books believes it is easier to make a readable book for boys than one for girls. Adventures are the features of almost all boys' books, and they are not difficult to find, while to make a book that will hold the attention with equal interest and still have the quieter qualities of a girl's book is much more difficult. But the girls like, as a rule, to read the boys' books, so it does not make much difference anyway.

One of the least pretentious of the present lot of books for boys is one of the best, for whatever books the boy may have, if he cares anything for out door life, tramps and living in the open, he will be glad of this one. It is "The Boy Scout's Hike Book," by Edward Cave, (Doubleday, Page & Co.) It is a rather small, green cloth-covered volume, showing a couple of boy scouts on the hike. There are 243 pages and over 100 illustrations, a full-page frontispiece, and the greater number of the remainder of the illustrations are line drawings in the text showing articles needed by hikers, methods of cooking, making tents and doing any of the hundred and one things necessary for any one who is tramping. A practical mess-kit is shown—fifteen articles, including the "ditty-kit," which is again illustrated open. A hiker's range and pot hook are illustrated, his "dingle-stick" and wind-break, and the boy hiker is shown making a compass with his own shadow.

Menus are given. For dinner the first day there are hoe cake, fried bacon, hot biscuits, and coffee. For supper boiled rice and milk with sugar, "dough gods" and tea. There are recipes showing how to mix the various dishes, and then, what is more important, how to cook them. The recipe for dough gods and the cooking is long. That for frying bacon is short and crisp. Here it is: "Fried Bacon—Just fry it; if you don't know how, your qualifications as a Scout should worry you."

The writer of the book, who is an active Scout Master, explains the need of it in the preface. "I have made diligent inquiry," says Mr. Cave, "and selected the best books I could find at any price to lend to a troop of over forty Boy Scouts of which I am Scout Master. In not a single instance has the book provided been kept for any length of time or brought a request to purchase a single copy. And these boys are intelligent, ambitious, enthusiastic about scouting, and well able to buy books."

***

In the fiction division of the boys' books comes an excellent story in "Messmates: Midshipman 'Pewee' Clifton's First Cruise," by William O. Stevens (J. P. Lippincott Company, $1.25). A good story of midshipmen is worth while. Everything about midshipmen is interesting, even the tight-fitting dress jackets which one in the book says make a number of them look "like a convention of the Bell Boys' Union." The writer tells his tale from a first hand experience of naval life, and the book carries its heroes into England, France, and Germany. There is any amount of fun in the book, and a mad dog episode is exciting in many ways.

A waiter in a French restaurant they visit thinks "Les Americains" are crazy when the boys ask for straws for lemonade, and tells them that horses and cattle, not men, eat straw in France. The proprietor becomes suspicious when he finds his guests have never met his American brother Gaston, who lives "in a place called Argentine."

***

"Harper's Wireless Book," by A. H. Verrill, and "Harper's Beginning Electricity," by Don Cameron Shafer, ($1 each,) are two more volumes in the practical series for boys that publishing house is bringing out. They are companion books, printed on good, heavy paper, with full-page frontispiece and many practical illustrations in the text. The wireless book is divided into three parts: "The Why and How of Wireless," "How to Build and Use Wireless Apparatus," and the third, "Wireless Telephony." The book on electricity is broad in its scope, giving the history of electricity, telling of the making of batteries and experiments. At the back of the book is a dictionary of electrical terms. There is a final full-page illustration showing the new model electric locomotive for the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad and an electric locomotive exhibited at the World's Fair in 1893.

Other excellent Harper books are "The Rainy Day Railroad War," by Holman Day, ($1,) the story of a plucky young engineer who puts through a railroad at the risk of his life in the country of a lumber boss; a jolly story of the adventures of a lot of boys with a fat boy leader, "Mark Tidd," by Clarence B. Kelland, ($1,) where there are a super number of weird stunts done by the youngsters. One of these is to raise a ghost—that is what the grown-ups think—when a bell is rung by unseen hands. It is really done by a boy with a sling-shot behind a fence. "Yong Alaskans in the Rockies," by Emerson Hough, ($1.25,) is a book of mountain adventures, with many excellent pictures of the country. "The Roaring Lions," by James Otis, (60 cents,) is one of those thoroughly good small-boy stories for which the writer is known. "The Roaring Lions" is a club of the boys. One of the things the "Lions" do is to give a show at which they make over $2.

***

There is a wreck and a rescue in the very first part of "The Responsibilities of Buddle," the last of a series of the Buddie books by Anna Chapin Ray, (Little, Brown & Co., $1.50.). Nothing serious happens in the wreck, and Ebenezer, the dog in the baggage car, is said not to have stopped gnawing his bone while the wreck was on. It makes a good tale to tell afterward, which Buddie does lustily. Chubbie, who shares the wreck incident, says that his first thought at the time of the shock was of his new hat. Chubbie prepares more respectable emotions for the occasion. "I thought of Aunt Julia and Ebenezer," he says. It is a good story. So is "Laddie, the Master of the House," by Lily Wesselhoeft, the same publishers, ($1.20.) Laddie is a Scotch collie, who has two equally fine and well-bred dog friends in Douglas and Wallace. They all join the "Bark and Whine Club," are gallant care takers of the children and a funny party is given for the dogs and "Monk," a big toy monkey. There are seventeen excellent pictures of animals in "Ned Brewsters' Bear Hunt," taken by the author, Chauncey J. Hawkins, (Little Brown & Co., $1.20.) Ned thinks hardships are fun, and has any number of adventures trying to get photographs of animals. Molly, a moose, is trained to be a pack mule; Blindy is a little rabbit, and there are two bear cubs, Donner and Blitzen, who make times exciting, and whose pictures are to be seen in the frontispiece

***

"Sonnie-Boys People" is the first story in a book of sea stories, some on the sea and some in harbor, by James B. Connely, (Charles Scribners Sons, $1.25.) One nice little story is told of a little five-year-old who sees his father, who has been on a cruise of several years. "No, that is not my papa; my papa has no legs," he says. The only father he has known has been the one he has been shown by his mother in a photograph, a bust picture, only head and shoulders, and that is the kind of a papa his baby mind has pictured.

***

"Laddie's Choice" is a charming story of three little English boys, the sons of an organist, by Mary Thurston Dodge, (Dodd, Mead & Co., $1.) The boys, who have no mother, come from the country to live with their father near the big cathedral. The story tells of the friends they make, of "Mrs. Friday," and of "the Princess," and "Laddie's Choice" is to be with the ones he loves best and not in a big house, even though there is a pony and many nice things that little boys love. The princess is a very lovely princess and very fond of her three knights, Sir Dumpling, Sir Bulbul, and Sir Galahad, she calls them. There are many nice little stories in the big story, though that is not very long.

***

An old-time Norse saga book is "Flamehair, The Skald," by H. Bedford Jones, (A. C. McClurg, $1.20,) a vivid story of those days when all men were heroes, and Harald, the particular hero of the book, proves himself one of them. There are excellent pictures, in keeping, by Dan Sayre Groesbeck. "The Trail to Eldorado," by Joseph Mills Hanson, (the same publishers, $1,) is a story of adventures on the plains in the days of buffaloes and dangerous Indians. The story winds up with the boys, Charlie and Zeb, at Walla Walla, where they find their father, whom they have not seen for a year and a half. It brings the tears of joy and great relief, even from the eyes of boys who have been roughing it for so long, for they have heard by mistake that their father was dead.

***

"Danny Fists," (by Walter Camp, Appletons, $1.35,) is a red-haired, freckle-faced boy with a hot temper, a good, clear-cut, clean character, and he is called Danny Fists instead of Danny Phipps, which is his real name, because he can use his fists to such good advantage. The story begins with a black eye. "It's a dandy eye," the senior Phipps, who was a red-haired boy himself once upon a time, says, admiringly. That is when he learns that there were no grudges to settle, no hard feelings following the blows that brought it, and that none of the "fellows" who are Danny's friends ever take advantage of a smaller boy. Danny Fists's mother takes a different view of fighting, however. She doesn't quite understand, and it is through her that Danny goes off to Manor Hall, a first-class boys' school, where, strange to say, the school chief has something of the same idea of fighting that Danny's father has. Danny gets into a scrimmage the very first day. It is a justifiable one, however, and makes him many friends. It gives the other boys confidence in him for football, the great Manor Hall game, and that is the beginning of a first-class football story. Of course, Danny Fists makes good.

There are hot-shot (and that is a good word for them) adventures from first to last in another book of the Appletons, "The Texan Triumph," ($1.35,) by Joseph A. Altsheler. It is a romance of the San Jacinto campaign, and Ned and Will are the two boys of the story. It is a solidly written book of 356 pages. The four colored illustrations do it full justice.

"Uncle David's Boys," by Edna A. Brown, (Lothrop, Lee & Shepard Company, $1,) is a homely story and its adventures all of the home sort. It tells of the vacation of a number of young people in a little mountain village. There is farm life, horses and cows, one of the adventures comes from the cattle breaking loose after salt; there is a house on fire, and many good times. Everett T. Tomlinson has another book of real adventures in "The Young Sharpshooter, A Story of the Peninsular Campaign in 1862," (Boughton, Mifflin Company, $1.50,) with war incidents and pictures. There is another one of the books of a familiar and interesting series in "Bob Dashaway in the Frozen Seas," by Cyrus Townsend Brady, (Dodd, Mead Company.) With whales, bears, mutinies, and dangers from ice and sea, there is excitement enough and to spare. The real experiences of wireless operators at sea in times of danger, as they appear in the daily news, give reality to such a book as "Bert Wilson, Wireless Operator," by J. W. Duffield, (Sully & Kleinteich, $1.20.) There is a savage tiger and a typhoon at sea in this book, in addition to other serious events. A companion volume is "Bert Wilson, Marathon Runner."

***

"The Young Trappers; Or, The Quest of the Giant Moose," is by Hugh Pendexter, (Small, Maynard & Co., 65 cents.) The young trappers are not certain whether they have caught the moose or the moose has caught them when "Bub" is yanked off his feet and goes over the side of the boat on to the great shoulders of the moose and then disappears into the water. There is a mystery in the story when "Cub" travels great distances on the lake and no one can tell how until they surprise him in a simple but satisfactory iceboat that he has manufactured.

"Cliff Sterling, Freshman at Stormbridge," by Gilbert Patten, (David McKay, $1.25,) starts in with a runaway in the second chapter and Cliff saves a life and finds a college chum. A shabby trick is undertaken later in the story to use him up before a football game.

***

A nice little "Billy Boy" is the one put into a story by Mary T. Waggaman, (The Ave Maria Press, 75c.) Billy has a bad spot in his lungs and goes out West to his big brother Jack. Big Brother Jack has not been doing as well as the family at home have believed, but Billy Boy, with his faith in him and because he is such a good little chap, straightens things out for both Jack and the family at home. "Historic Adventures," by Rupert S. Holland, (George W. Jacobs & Co., $1.50,) is a book of tales and adventures from American history. The first story tells of children taken in a raid by Indians, kept by them for several years until they become so much like Indians that it is only with difficulty that they are recognized when they are brought back to the white people again. A Bible story book is "The Shepherd of Us All, Stories of the Christ Retold for Children," by Mary Steward, (Fleming H. Revell Company, $1.25.) The illustrations are from paintings.

WHAT WAR MEANS

¶ "The war debt of Europe to-day exceeds $37,000,000,000. The debt will never be paid; can never be paid."

¶ "We (the United States) are now spending more than $800,000 per day on the army and navy; more than $10,000 per day on smokeless powder alone."

¶ "A battleship costs as much as a university."

¶ "The most powerful lobby in the world is that employed by the great armament builders of England and Germany."

¶ "War is no longer a matter of patriotism—it is strictly a matter of business."

QUERIES AND ANSWERS IN ALL BRANCHES OF LITERATURE

COMMUNICATIONS for these columns should be addressed to the Editor of Queries and Answers, New York Times Review of Books. They should be written on only one side of the paper and must contain the name and address of the writer. If the inquirer prefers, initials only will be printed with the communication.

ANSWERS BY THE EDITOR

W. A. JONES.—Could you refer me to the old song that begins:

The clover blossoms kiss her feet,
She is so sweet, she is so sweet.
While I, who may not kiss her hand,
Bless all the wild flowers in the land.

The old song about which our correspondent inquires is "The Clover Blossoms," by Oscar Leighton. It is printed in a collection of verse, entitled "Because I Love You," compiled by A. H. Mack and published by Lee & Shepard, Boston, and in another collection, entitled "For Thee Alone," by G. Hartshorne, published by Dana Estes & Co. also of Boston.

CHICAGO. — Can you favor me with the author and full quotation of the lines beginning:

"I shall pass through this world but once.
Any good thing, do it now."

This is not correct, but the first few words, I believe, may enable you to trace it.

The quotation for which our correspondent asks is as follows: "I expect to pass through this world but once. Any good, therefore, that I can do, or any kindness that I can show to any fellow-creature, let me do it now. Let me not defer or neglect it, for I shall not pass this way again."

The authorship of this sentiment has not been satisfactorily established. Benham's "Book of Quotations" says on this subject:

"Every effort to identify the author of this much-quoted saying has failed. It has been attributed to Stephen Grellet, an American Quaker of French birth, who was born in 1773 and died in 1855; to Ralph Waldo Emerson; to Edward Courtenay, Earl of Devon, this being, however, a mistake due to a partial resemblance to it in the Earl's epitaph; to Sir Rowland Hill, (1744-1833) to Marcus Aurelius; to Thomas Carlyle; to Miss A. B. Hazeman, and others. It is said that the germ of it is to be found in the writings of a Chinese philosopher. There seems to be some authority in favor of Stephen Grellet being the author, but the passage does not occur in any of his printed works.

"In 'Blessed Be Drudgery,' by William C. Gannett, the saying is thus recorded: 'The old Quaker was right. I expect to pass through life but once. If there is any kindness or any good thing I can do to my fellow-beings, let me do it now. I shall pass this way but once.'"

J. C.—I should consider it a great favor if you would refer me to some books containing the political history of this State, and giving the names of the publishers.

The "Political History of the State of New York," by D. S. Alexander, three volumes, is published by Henry Holt & Co., 34 West Thirty-third Street, this city, at $2.50 a volume; the "History of Political Parties in the Province of New York, 1760-76," by C. L. Becker, is published, at 75 cents, by the University of Wisconsin, Madison, Wis.; "Political History of New York State During the Period of the Civil War," by S. D. Brummer, is published by Longmans, Green & Co., 443 Fourth Avenue, this city, at $3.

H. A. WEINGARTEN.—I have a book the full title of which is "A Collection of Sundry Books," written by James Naylor, some of which were never before printed, with an Impartial Relation of the Most Remarkable Transaction Relating to his Life." Printed and sold by J. Sonle in London, 1716. Published by J. Canfield, 1823. Has it any value?

The writings of James Naylor, the Quaker, born about 1617, died 1660, fell into neglect, but this "Collection" of them, omitting his controversial pieces of 1665-6, was edited in 1716 by George Whitehead with an "Impartial Account" of his career. The 1823 edition does not seem to be of special value. Naylor's "How Sin is Strengthened and How it is Overcome," one of the many tracts written during his long imprisonment, has been frequently reprinted. His "Last Testimony," beginning "There is a Spirit Which I Feel," has often been cited for the purity of its pathos.

C. A. N.—Can you tell me where I could purchase the poem, "The Wants of Man," by John Adams? Is it possible to secure the poem published alone or in collections of poems?

The poem "Wants of Man," by John Quincy Adams, is printed in full in Bryant's "Library of Poetry and Song," in Vol. VI. of World's Best Poetry, and in "Choice Selections No. 6," published by the Penn Puolishing Company of Philadelphia, Penn.

ANSWERS FROM READERS

W. S. A.—In your issue of Oct. 28, in answer to "I. F. S.," you say that the line "Douglas, Douglas, Tender and True," is from a poem by Mrs. Dinah Mulock Craik. While this is true as far as it goes, and Mrs. Craik's poem may be the one your correspondent desired to find, the fact is the words quoted are from a poem written long before she was born, "The Howlet," by Sir John Holland, and are only used by her as a refrain to her own verses.

BOOKWORM.—"A. Hollister" will find the lines he is in search of in the last verse of the first canto of "Lara," by Lord Byron. This verse and the opening lines of the second canto have been much admired by lovers of the poet, and show Byron in his best form. It is as follows:

The crowd are gone, the revellers at rest,
The courteous host, and all approving guest,
Again to that accustomed couch must creep
Where joy subsides, and sorrow sighs to sleep;
And man o'erlabored with his being's strife,
Shrinks to that sweet forgetfulness of life.
There lie love's feverish hope, and cunning's guile,
Hate's working brain, and lulled ambition's wile;
O'er each vain eye oblivion's pinions wave,
And quenched existence crouches in a grave.
What better name may slumber's bed become?
Night's sepulchre, the universal home,
Where weakness, strength, vice, virtue, sunk supine,
Alike in naked helplessness recline;
Glad for a while to heave unconscious breath,
Yet wake to wrestle with the dread of death;
And shun though day but dawns on ills increased,
That sleep, the loveliest since it dreams the least.

A. K. B.—The song asked for by "S. B. A." in your issue of Oct. 19 is called "Pretty Polly Oliver." I think it can be obtained at any music dealer's. The first verse is as follows:

Oh, pretty Polly Oliver,
The pride of her sex,
For the love of a grenadier
Her poor heart did vex;
He loved her right faithfully
In the good town of Bow,
Then marched off to foreign lands
A fighting the foe.

H. S. LOUNSBURY.—In reply to "J. O. B." in your issue of Nov. 2, would say that the poem about which he inquired is "There Is No Such Thing as Death," by Charles Mackay, and it runs as follows:

There is no such thing as death.
In nature nothing dies.
From each mad remnant of decay
Some forms of life arise.

The little leaf that falls
All brown and sere to earth
Ere long will mingle with the buds
That give the flower its birth.

A. L. D.—The old English poem asked for by E. C. Chappell can be found in a song cycle entitled, "Flora's Holiday," by H. Lane Wilson, published by Boosey & Co. The poem is "Sound Argument," and contains the following lines:

We mortals, made up of frail clay,
Alas! are the children of sorrow.
And though brisk, bright, and merry today,
We all may be wretched to-morrow.

An answer to this appeal was also received from Robert Gayler, New York.

ADELAIDE M. PRIME.—"L. B." (Oct. 26) will find the quotation:

"Base envy withers at another's joy,
And hates that excellence it cannot reach,"

in Thomson's "Seasons; Spring." Line 284.

LAWRENCE.—The lines noted by "J. M. B." (query of Oct. 12) are from "The Queen's Ball," by Mrs. Archer Clive. They should read:

Yet genius is a deathless light,
That still burns on through thickest night;
It fires a steady lamp whose rays
Descend through time, like stars through space.

A. B.—Below is another translation of Heine's poem, for which Miss Caroline Bensel asked some weeks ago. It is printed in a book entitled "To My Darling and Other Poems":

Once an image sweet and lovely
Filled my life with splendor bright;
But the lovely image vanished
And left me to dreary night.

When the children are in darkness
Evil phantoms on them throng,
And to free their minds from anguish
They will sing a joyous song.

Now, like children, I am singing
In the night so dark and drear;
Though the tunes are not amusing,
Still they freed my heart from fear.

APPEALS TO READERS

A. J. MARKS.—Will some kind reader let me know the author and where I may find the following:

A spirit haunts the year's last hours,
Dwelling amid their yellowing bowers;
To himself he talks;
For at eventide, listening earnestly, at his work you may hear him sob and sigh
In the walks;
Earthward he boweth the heavy stalks
Of the moldering flowers;
Heavily hangs the broad sunflower over its grave i' the earth so chilly;
Heavily hangs the hollyhock,
Heavily hangs the tiger lily.

CHARLOTTE PHAYRE.—Can any of your readers tell me where to find the poem containing the following lines and who is the author:

With my own hands I made the Cross
That I must bear up life's steep Calvary.
I chose the heaviest wood I could
And drove the nails to hard and fast.

There are three or four more verses, I think.

H. V. MILLIGAN.—Can any of your readers give the name of the author, or the publisher, of a poem of which the following is the first stanza:

I've known the Spring in England,
And, oh, it's pleasant there
When all the buds are breaking
And all the land is fair!
But all the time the heart of me,
The better, sweeter part of me,
Was sobbin' for the robin
In the fields o' Ballyclare.

A. L. D.—Can any reader tell me the author of the poem beginning:

Night and the curtaine drawn,
The household still.

I have forgotten the remaining lines, but the last verses are:

Close to the dying blaze
We sit alone.
Naught but the old days last.
All else—our own.
Far in the corners dim
The shadows start.
Near to your strength I cling.
And rear your heart.
Dearest—the whole world ends,
Ends well—in this
Night and the firelit dark,
Your touch, your kiss.

R. H.—Will some reader be good enough to tell me from what poem is the following quotation and who is the author:

Like the bat of Indian brakes
Her pinion fans the wound she makes,
And soothing thus the dreamer's pains
She sucks the life blood from his veins.

M. P.—I should like to know from what poem the following lines come and who wrote them:

This is the land of waters, where the coast,
Wave-pierced, by winding inlet paths is crossed.

Perhaps one of your readers can help me.

O. E. JOHNSON.—Can any reader tell me the author of the following lines, which are said to have been found under the pillow of a soldier during the civil war:

My good right hand
Forgets her cunning now;
To make the weary march
I know not how.
I am not eager, bold, or strong;
All that is past,
And I am ready not to do,
At last, at last.

E. F. A.—Will some reader kindly tell me the author of the following lines and where I may obtain a copy of the entire poem:

As I left the halls of Lumley
Rose a vision of a maid more comely,
Who was worshipped from afar,
And I wondered, idly, blindly,
If the maid would treat me kindly.

WILLIAM L. SNYDER.—Could some reader tell me the name of the author of the poem entitled "The Greek Galley"? The first verse is as follows:

The sound of the sea, the sway of the song, the awing of the oar;
Out of the darkness, over the naked seas,
Our galley is come,
With a shiver and leap,
As the blade bites deep.
To the sway of back and the bend of knees,
As she drives for home
Out of the darkness, over the naked seas,
To the sound of the sea, and the sway of song, and the sweep of oar.
I would like the entire poem.

W. S. C.—Can some reader locate the poem containing these lines, giving author:

Closer is he than breathing,
Nearer than hands and feet.

P. J. J.—Can any of your readers furnish me with a poem called "Motherlook," running along like this: "The motherlook that wanders in a happy woman's eyes"?

NEWS FROM THE WORLD OF BOOKS

Publications Fewer in Number but of Marked Importance as the Holidays Draw Near PUBLISHING seasons are no longer as sharply defined as they were a few years ago. Formerly, there was a great flood of books in the Autumn, and a somewhat smaller flood in the early Spring. The Winter—after December—and the Summer—after the last of May—were periods of inaction.

Now, however, there is a strongly marked tendency among the leading publishers to spread out their lists over many months. It is not that individual lists are larger—indeed, in many cases they are decidedly smaller. It is simply that the policy has changed, that books are issued regularly rather than spasmodically.

The coming of Winter brings no pause to the activities of G. P. Putnam's Sons. One of the most interesting announcements bn their list is that of the immediate publication of Gilbert K. Chesterton's "Magic," which is being played at The Little Theatre, in London. They write of his reputation as a "brilliant essayist, a biographer of unusual penetration, and as a novelist" but they do not mention what many people—including Mrs. Chesterton—consider his most important rôle, that of poet. And the description of "Magic" indicates that the gifts that made the "Ballad of the White Horse" a lasting delight, show in this fantastic comedy. It is to be hoped that it will be played, as well as published, in New York.

It is with some amazement that we find the name "Annabel Lee" given as that of the compiler of "Little Stories by Big Men," published by the Putnams last Friday. Evidently the "kingdom of the sea" is no place of pleasant idleness. It is a collection of anecdotes that the namesake of Poe's lady has made—of anecdotes chiefly by living public men.

Another book published by this house last Friday was Sophie Jewett's "Folk Ballads of Southern Europe." It contains, Romanian, Provencal, Piedmontese, French, and Portuguese ballads, with translations in English verse by the compiler.

On Saturday Dodd, Mead & Co. published a book which is sure of an enthusiastic reception and of a permanent place in the literature of exploration. It is "Scott's Last Expedition," consisting of the journals of the heroic Captain, with reports of the scientific work accomplished during the expedition. Leonard Huxley edited it, with the assistance of Lady Scott and of the surviving members of the expedition. The two large octavo volumes contain photogravure portraits of Capt. Scott and Dr. Wilson, reproductions of Capt. Scott's diary, and many full-page illustrations in color.

Another "travel book," very different in character, was published by this house on the same day. This is Martin Johnson's "Through the South Seas with Jack London." Mr. Johnson had a berth on the Snark and he is an intimate friend of the illustrions antagonist of John Barleycorn.

And Henry W. Farnsworth has written what may be called a "travel book," "The Log of a World-be War Correspondent," it is called, and it bears the Dodd Mead imprint. Mr. Farnsworth observed the Balkan war unofficially, following the armies with a Greek guide, who after a while deserted him. His impressions should be entertaining reading.

Two recent art books come from Dodd Mead & Co. One is H. W. Lewar's "The China Collector"—a thorough study of old English ceramics, copiously illustrated, and intended especially for the guidance of the amateur. The other is "Hans Holbein the Younger," by Arthur B. Chamberlain. There are two volumes about Holbein and his work, and plenty of pictures.

Among the new books published by the George H. Doran Company is one "novel with a purpose"—Jeannette Mark's "Leviathan." It is about the evils of the drug habit—whether the drug censured is cocaine, opium, morphine, or heroin, the announcement does not reveal. Miss Mark has previously been known chiefly as a writer of stories and verses for children, and her work in a more serious vein will be read with interest.

Another "serious" novel on the Doran list is Helen Woodruff's "The Lady of the Lighthouse." Mrs. Woodruff became temporarily blind two years ago during a severe illness, and she wrote this book as a thanksgiving offering for the recovery of her sight, and in order to call attention to the work of preventing blindness and alleviating the sufferings of the blind. The profits of its sale are to be given to the blind.

Close upon the news that the Nobel Prize for Literature for 1913 had gone to Rabindranath Tagore came the announcement of two new books by this Hindu poet, published by the Macmillan Company. They are "The Crescent Moon" and "Sadhana, the Realization of Life." The first is a book of poems for children, illustrated in color by a Hindu artist. The other consists of essays, some of which were delivered as lectures at Oxford and Harvard. Mr. Tagore's admirers have, in this country, formed a small but devoted group. Their number will undoubtedly be increased by Mr. Tagore's new honor. By the way, what has become of that other Oriental poet who gained fame in England some eight months ago, Miss Sarajini Naidu?

The Macmillan Company published Theodore Roosevelt's autobiography last week. It differs from most autobiographies, it is said, in being chiefly about living people. There are numerous illustrations, including many unconventional portraits of the Colonel and his family.

Next week Henry Holt & Co. will publish L. P. Jack's "All Men are Ghosts," a volume of short stories. Dr. Jack's "Mad Shepherds" and "Among the Idolmakers" were books of unusual interest, showing that their author combined humor and skill in narrative with keen spiritual insight.

Submarine Engineering

In a generously illustrated volume entitled "Submarine Engineering of Today," Charles W. Domville-Fife, an English writer, gives a popular account of the methods by which engineering operations are carried on under water. He also intelligently describes the latest types of submarine boats, and shows how they are used. (J. B. Lippincott Company. $1 50.)

Writing Short Stories.

Excellent advice to literary novices is given by Modeste Hannis Jordan, editor of The Writers' Magazine, in a little book entitled "The Art of Short-Story Writing Simplified." Anybody with a talent for story-writing undoubtedly will profit through a careful reading of Mr. Jordan's text. (Hannis Jordan Company. 50 cents.)

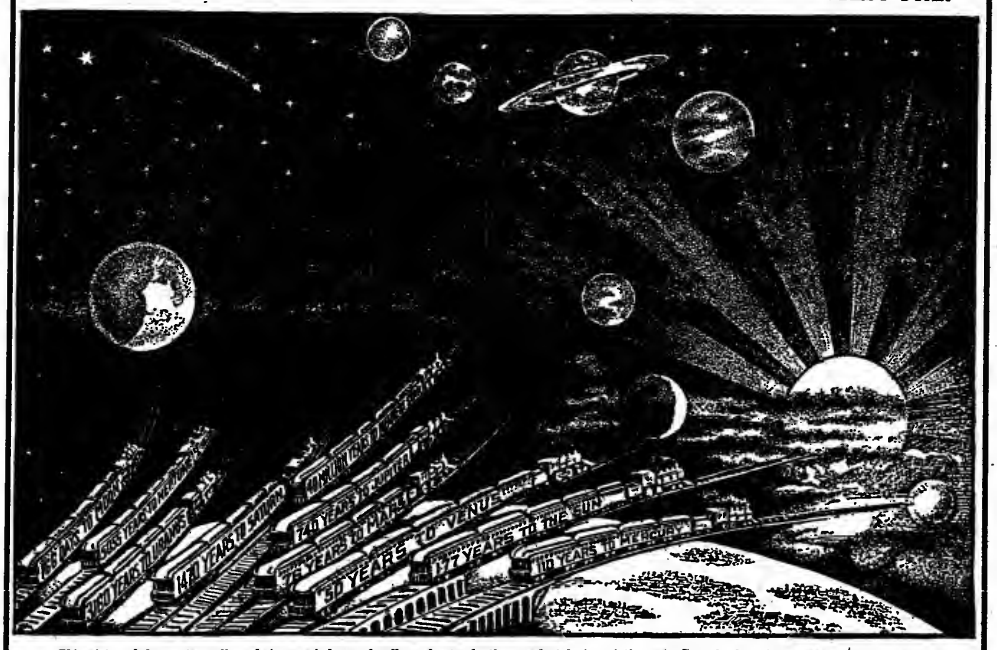
One of Ten Thousand Educational Pictures

WHICH THE BOOK OF KNOWLEDGE DESCRIBES

THE SPACE NO MAN CAN MEASURE! FLYING FORTY MILLION YEARS TO THE NEAREST STAR



This picture helps us to realize what our minds can hardly understand—the wonderful size of the universe. Such trains as these, which dash past us almost before we can see them, would take 177 years to travel from the earth to the sun, if there were a railway on which they could travel a mile a minute and never stop; and a train starting from the earth for the nearest star would not arrive for forty million years! The figures on these trains give the time it would take the trains, traveling all the time sixty miles an hour, to reach the planets.

One of the foremost educators in this country says:

"Suppose a boy of ten were to spend fifteen minutes a day reading these volumes. . . . he would at thirteen know more about the earth and life on it than the wisest men knew a few generations ago."

F. C. Lewis,
Supt. Ethical Culture School, New York.

"An adult can read the book with almost as much relish as a child. . . . I cannot say more than this, that I subscribe heartily to President Finley's estimate in the introduction."

Godfrey M. Brinley, Master
St. Paul's School, Concord, N. H.

"I have observed THE BOOK OF KNOWLEDGE in use among the boys at school, and I have read it with deep interest and profit myself, and I am much impressed by its fascination for every one who owns it or who uses it."

Charles A. A. J. Miller,
Assistant Supt. Baltimore Public Schools.

The Book of Knowledge is a work intensely interesting and of incalculable worth to any child in any home. It is alike profitable in the boy's shop, the girl's room, the young man's den, and the family library. It is a fountain of information on all subjects about which the young and old may and do ask questions."

Miss Grace C. Strachan,
District Superintendent, Brooklyn.

"Tho' we have always had a number of books in the house, I have never seen the children take so marked and intelligent an interest in any other books. I have not the slightest doubt that they are of immeasurable value to children of all ages and of both sexes."

Hackley School,
Tarrytown, N. Y.

"We consider 'The Book of Knowledge' a distinct acquisition to our Library. It is the most popular set of books that we have and one which commends itself, without any effort on our part, to the constant attention of the boys. We are considering ordering another. Sincerely yours,

Walter B. Gage.

The New York Times says:

"The old saying has it that a bright child is a big interrogation mark; but everybody knows that the child gets comparatively few good and efficient answers to the questions he asks. Think what it will mean to the children to put into their hands THE BOOK OF KNOWLEDGE, a work that will tell them what they wish to know."

The New Century's Greatest Gift

THE BOOK OF KNOWLEDGE is a wonderful new plan by which the world of knowledge is opened up to the mind of the child, and made almost equally fascinating to adult readers. It contains all the important knowledge of the world from the tiny atom to the starry universe—arranged and indexed so skillfully that the scientific facts and truths of Nature, History, Astronomy, Biography, Physics, Art, Literature and Our Own Life can be found quickly and with perfect ease. It is the only work of reference so arranged as to form delightful reading courses in the Great Departments of Knowledge.

Make This the Happiest Christmas

All children are fascinated by pictures, in love with stories, filled with wonder over the marvels of the earth and sky and sea. You cannot make them happier than by giving them THE BOOK OF KNOWLEDGE for Christmas. It contains the greatest amount of pure delight, coupled with the real information so necessary to the inquiring mind of the growing child. It is the first book of reference ever made for children, where they can find everything they want to know quickly and easily. Each year without THE BOOK OF KNOWLEDGE is a distinct loss to the child's development, and one which can never quite be made up. Let this Christmas be the one you will remember longest because it brought THE BOOK OF KNOWLEDGE into the home.

SOCIETY IN BRILLIANT ASSEMBLIES IN SEASON'S SECOND WEEK

Dancing Contest Tuesday Night at Sherry's for St. Ambrose Mission—Mrs. Charles Dana Gibson, Mrs. Oliver Jennings, Worthington Whitehouse Among the Judges—A Busy Week for Debutantes—Plans for Russian Costume Ball at Ritz-Carlton on Dec. 18.

THE first week of the Winter season was a brilliant one, with large and interesting assemblies at the opera and the Horse Show. The vagaries of fashion were never more in evidence than at the Horse Show, and the weather man cut up such high jinks, in sending unusually warm weather, while dowager and matron were clad in ermine and sables, that indoor affairs, especially where there was a crush, were almost uncomfortable. The débutantes in diaphanous chiffons were the envied ones of the week.

Once the formal season has been begun, however, it would take a social cataclysm to hold it in check, and the coming weeks are to be filled with all sorts of entertaining. Dancing still holds its spell over society, and the tango and the turkey trot have not by any means been relegated to the attic, where repose the minuet, the quadrille, and the two-step, as the prudish predicted long ago. Dancing tournaments are to be the rage this year. Announcements of tournaments, or dancing contests, are forthcoming almost daily. Society is simply dancing its head off, figuratively speaking, to syncopated time.

It has been a notable week in more ways than one. There have been many distinguished visitors in town, and hardly an afternoon or evening, wherever society was congregated, but that one was sure to rub elbows with a foreign Ambassador, Princes and Princesses, lords and ladies, the presence of whom is always sought by society so as to add a certain lustre to republican assemblies, much to the astonishment of our cousins across the seas.

Thanksgiving Day will be celebrated in the old-fashioned way in town and country, with family gatherings, and many are filling their country houses for the day. Football is the great week-end lure for society these days, many going to Boston yesterday for the game.

New York Exchange for Woman's Work.

There will be a Christmas sale of dainty and inexpensive articles, given by the members of the exchange, at the home of Mrs. C. A. de Gersdorff, 39 East Sixty-fourth Street, on Monday, Dec. 8, from 11 until 6. The patronesses are Mrs. Russell Sage, Mrs. W. V. Lawrence, Mrs. John Seely Ward, Mrs. Charles E. Miller, Mrs. John S. Terry, Jr., Mrs. Herbert Johnston, Miss Herriman, and Miss Stimson.

Incidents in Society.

Society will attend the Army and Navy football game, which is to be held on Saturday afternoon at the Polo Grounds, and which will attract visitors from all the Eastern cities. President Wilson will have thirty-seven tickets for his family and friends to witness the game.

Mrs. Samuel Milbank is to give a luncheon to-morrow at the Ritz-Carlton.

Miss Marie La Montagne is sailing for Europe on Tuesday.

Mr. and Mrs. Gerald Livingston Hoyt and Lydig Hoyt plan to return to town from Staatsburg, N. Y., about Dec. 1.

Gov.-elect Fielder and Mrs. Fielder of New Jersey are to be entertained at a dinner and reception on Dec. 3 by Mrs. Caroline B. Alexander at her home at Castle Point, Hoboken.

Mme. Ali Kuli Khan, wife of the Persian Charge d'Affaires at Washington, was a guest last week of Dr. and Mrs. Florian Krug at 830 Park Avenue.

Mrs. Robert E. Westcott has returned from Europe and is at 787 Fifth Avenue, to remain until January.

Mr. and Mrs. Adrian Iselin, 2d, are receiving congratulations on the birth of a son last week at their home, 829 Park Avenue. The child is to receive the name of Adrian Iselin, 3d. Mrs. Iselin was Miss Madeleine L'Engel of New Orleans, and her marriage to Mr. Iselin, who is the son of C. Oliver Iselin, took place in Paris in the Autumn of 1911.

Count and Countess Laszlo Szechenyi were in town for the opera with the Countess's mother, Mrs. Vanderbilt, and are returning to the Breakers at Newport to spend Thanksgiving. The Count and Countess were visitors at the Horse Show, and were with Mrs. Alfred G. Vanderbilt.

Vincent Astor celebrated his twenty-second birthday on Nov. 15. He was in town last week and entertained a few friends at luncheon at the St. Regis in honor of his fiancé, Miss Helen Dinsmore Huntington, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Robert P. Huntington of Staatsburg, N. Y. The Church of the Messiah at Rhinebeck, N. Y., will have the Rev. Francis K. Little as its new pastor. Rev. Little was formerly assistant at the Cathedral of St. John the Divine. The church is the religious home of the Astor family. The late Col. John Jacob Astor was one of the stanchest supporters, and his son is still loyal to the church, and it may be the scene in the Spring of Mr. Astor's marriage to Miss Huntington. On Wednesday, Dec. 1, Conte and Contesse E. del Sera are to give a dinner and dance at their home, 10 West Fifty-third Street, for Miss Huntington and Mr. Astor.

Count and Countess Pierre de Viel Castel are expected to arrive here next month to pass part of the Winter with Mrs. Charles R. Scott, mother of the Countess.

Mr. and Mrs. Pembroke Jones have opened their house at 5 East Sixty-first Street for the Winter. Mrs. Jones had Box 11 at the opera for the opening night, and had her son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. John Russell Pope, with her.

Mr. and Mrs. Winthrop Burr are occupying the Newbold Edgar house at 28 East Thirty-ninth Street for the Winter.

Some of the visitors in town last week for the opera and horse show included the Russian Ambassador and Mme. Bakhmeteff, the German Ambassador, and Countess von Bernstorff, the Spanish Ambassador and Señora de Riano, Mr. and Mrs. Edward T. Stotesbury, and Mr. and Mrs. Joseph E. Widener of Philadelphia, and Lieut. W. B. Sifton of Ottawa, Ont.

Mrs. Clarence C. Rice of 81 Irving Place is giving a tea on Tuesday, Dec. 2, from 3 to 6, in connection with the exhibition at her home of small pieces of faranes from the Durant kilns, which opens on Wednesday, to continue until Dec. 24.

Dance at Sherry's on Tuesday for St. Ambrose Mission.

Society is interested in the dance which is to be given on Tuesday night at Sherry's for the benefit of the Children's Club of St. Ambrose Mission, 236 East 111th Street, in the centre of picturesque "Little Italy." It is to be held under the auspices of the New York Guild of the Alumnae of St. Timothy's School, Catonsville, Md.

Many members of the guild take charge of the classes, clubs and drills at the Children's Club at the mission, and the workers are anxious to enlarge and improve the building in which the club is situated. The proceeds of the dance are to be distributed toward the building fund, which was started last year by the proceeds from a bridge party held at Sherry's, amounting to $1,100.

Mrs. Arthur O. Choate is President of the Children's Club, Miss Elizabeth Reed Vice President, Mrs. William Willis Reese Treasurer, and Miss Ruth Haskins Secretary.

There will be a dancing contest, for which eighteen prizes are to be awarded, consisting of first, second, and third prizes for men and women, in the waltz, one-step, and tango. Among those who are to judge the dancing will be Mrs. Charles Dana Gibson, Mrs. Oliver Jennings, Mrs. Fellows Morgan, Miss Juliana Cutting, Worthington Whitehouse, W. T. Jerome, Samuel Roosevelt, Francis Crowninshield, and Sir Johnstone and Lady Forbes Robertson. Rhythm and grace are to be the qualifications of judging, and no extreme steps will be permitted. The contests will begin at 10:30, and general dancing is to follow. There will be bridge tables for those who do not wish to dance.

Tickets at $3 each may be obtained from Miss Hilah French, 43 West Fifty-first Street, who also has charge of the entries for the dancing contest, which is free.

The committee specially in charge of the dance includes Mrs. Stephen C. Clark, Chairman; Mrs. Arthur O. Choate, and the Misses Mary Martin, Hilah French, Ina Kissel, Grace Brown, Marian Baldwin, Rosetta Carson, Jennie Tailer, Mary Arnold, Genevieve Sanford, Anita Emmet, and Margaret Strong.

Concerning the Debutantes.

There was some interesting affairs for the debutantes last week, who are now coming into their own. From now until after the holidays the buds will be charmingly conspicuous in the social doings of the town. Many of them were seen last week in the boxes at the horse show and at the opera.

Luncheons for débutantes began on Monday with Mrs. Warren E. Dennis's luncheon at Sherry's for fifty. Among those present were the Misses Lois Cassatt, Miriam Harriman, Marie Tailer, Beatrice Burrill, Louise Trevor, Mary Turnure, Caramai Carroll, Alexandra Emery, Louise Butler, Mildred Dennis, and others.

On Wednesday Mrs. John Parker Gilford gave a tea dance at Sherry's to introduce her daughter, Miss Lentilhon Gilford.

Mrs. John Myers Shedd gave a reception that day at her home, 148 East Thirty-eighth Street, to introduce her daughter, Miss Barbara Shedd, and her niece, Miss Katharone Clinton Husted. Miss Esther Cleveland was among the receiving party.

On the same day Miss Clementine Rees gave a large luncheon at Sherry's for her débutante niece, Miss Virginia Scully, and Mrs. W. Eugene Parsons gave a luncheon at Sherry's for her daughter, Miss Le Brun Parsons. Mrs. Noah Cromwell Rogers also gave a luncheon on that day for her second daughter, Miss Grace B. Rogers, at her residence, 19 East Fifty-sixth Street. Mrs. Rogers has cards out for a reception on Saturday for Miss Rogers at her home.

Miss Helen Hyde on Thursday gave a luncheon for Miss Louise Butler, the débutante daughter of Mrs. William Allan Butler, and Miss Coline Ingersoll, the débutante daughter of Colin Macrae Ingersoll, gave a small luncheon for Miss Ruth Draper of Boston.

Mrs. Riley Miles Gilbert introduced her daughter, Miss Annie Gilbert, yesterday afternoon at a reception at her home, 563 Park Avenue, which was followed by a dinner and theatre party.

Mrs. Oliver B. Bridgman gave a débutante luncheon at Sherry's on Friday for Miss Anna Bridgman.

Among the débutante affairs scheduled for this week will be a reception tomorrow, to be given by Mrs. Archibald M. Denny, Jr., at 41 West Eleventh Street, for her sister, Miss Elinor W. Kendall.

Mrs. Gustav E. Kissel is to give a dance at Sherry's on Tuesday evening for her daughter, Miss Dorothy Kissel.

Mrs. Daniel Leary of 26 West Forty-ninth Street will give a reception on Tuesday at her home for her daughter, Miss Beth Leary, which will be followed by a theatre party. Among those who will assist in receiving will be the Misses Marian Hall, Priscilla Bull, Frances M. Ward, Evangeline Hill, Joy Williams, Helen Emerson, and Dorothy Taylor.

Mrs. Ernest A. Bigelow of 12 East Fifty-sixth Street will give a reception on Wednesday to introduce Miss Katharine Fay Wilmerding, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Charles H. Wilmerding of Baltimore, Md. A dinner and dance will follow the reception.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Steele are to give a dance on Thanksgiving Eve for their youngest daughter, Miss Kathryn Steele. The guests will include their neighbors and their guests for Thanksgiving in the Meadow Brook district and will number about 200.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles William Romeyn of 63 East Sixty-fourth Street will give a tea dance at Sherry's on Wednesday for their débutante daughter, Miss Estelle Y. Romeyn. Mrs. Romeyn has Thursdays this season for her day at home.

Dr. and Mrs. William Culbert of 16 East Fifty-fourth Street are to give a reception on Wednesday at their home for their daughter, Miss Katherine Culbert.

Mrs. Henry Morgenthau is giving a dance at the Ritz-Carlton on Wednesday for her daughter, Miss Ruth Morgenthau.

Mrs. Walter Watson is to give a reception at her home, 52 West Fifty-second Street, on Friday, for her daughter, Miss Mai Watson, for whom she will give a ball at Sherry's on Dec. 26.

Mrs. H. Hobart Potter is giving a reception on Friday afternoon at her home, 405 Park Avenue, when she will introduce her second daughter, Miss Margaret Seton Potter.

Mrs. A. Moore Richards will give a tea dance at Sherry's on Saturday for her débutante daughter, Miss Elvine Richards.

Mrs. Clarence C. Chapman of 535 Park Avenue will give a reception on Saturday afternoon for her niece, Miss Evelyn Scott.

Mrs. James Christy Bell of 30 West Thirty-seventh Street is to give a theatre party, with supper and dancing afterward, for Miss Mildred Dennis on Dec. 11.

Miss Edith Ewing Bouvier, eldest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John Vernon Bouvier, Jr., is to make her début in society at a tea dance, which is to be held at Sherry's on Friday afternoon, Dec. 12. Miss Bouvier is fond of all outdoor sports, having spent much of her time at her father's country home at Nutley, N. J.

Other débutantes who have had entertainments arranged for them, to take place between now and Jan. 1, include the Misses Margaret Clarkson Henderson, Margaret Warren, Catherine Colt, Mildred C. Mordaunt, Helen de Forest Griffin, Elsie Stevens, Katharine Flagg, Virginia Geddes, Christina Nichols, Marion Janet Becker, Alida Banks, Coline M. Ingersoll, Emilie W. Ford, Marion P. Gibney, Louisa Morris Livingston, Dorothy Anderton, Augusta McCagg, Dorothy J. Manice, Elizabeth W. Emmons, Naomi H. Andrews, Noeline Haskins, Annette R. Fallows, Margaret L. Strong, Virginia Pulleyn, Elizabeth Klapp, Flora B. McAlpin, Lucia Edith Phillips, Cordelia Hepburn, Louise M. Herrick, Mary C. Cumnock, Edith Adams, Penelope Sears, Alexandra Emery, Katharine Oakman, Evelyn Scott, Joy Williams, Miriam Harriman, Mary Alexander, Mimi Scott, Dorothy Battle, Elizabeth Howard, Leonie Burrill and Maud Coster.

The Russian Costume Ball.

Many dinners are to be given on the evening of the Russian costume ball arranged by Mrs. Oliver Iselin, Mrs. George Draper, and Mrs. Theodore Roosevelt, Jr., and other society women, which is to be held at the Ritz-Carlton on Thursday, Dec. 18, for the benefit of the Lenox Hill Settlement, Seventy-second Street and Avenue A.

Mrs. George Clark, Mrs. Earl Dodge, Mrs. Charles B. Alexander, Mrs. H. H. Rogers, Mrs. Henry Fairfield Osborn, and Henry Sloane, and others, are to be among those who will entertain at dinner, taking their guests afterward to the ball, which promises to be one of the most unique and superb events of the season.

Significance is attached to the fact that it will fall on the eve of the Czar's birthday. The band is to be in Russian imperial uniform. A vaudeville entertainment will enliven the occasion. Miss Julia Robbins and Frederick Frelinghuysen are to dance, and Miss Josephine Osborn, Miss Edith Mortimer, and Mrs. J. B. Eustis are also to appear in the vaudeville. The decorations are to be in keeping with the occasion, and the Russian costuming will add much that is picturesque and dazzling to the eye.

Mrs. George Draper of 162 East Sixty-third Street is in charge of the sale of tickets, which are $5 each. The tickets are selling like the proverbial hot cakes.

The patronesses include Mrs. Ernest Iselin, Mrs. Robert Brewster, Mrs. Goodhue Livingston, Mrs. Theodore Douglas Robinson, Mrs. Robert Gerry, Mrs. Sumner Gerard, Mrs. H. Fairfield Osborn, Mrs. Stuyvesant Fish, Mrs. John Pratt, Mrs. H. H. Rogers, Mrs. Charles Dana Gibson, Mrs. Norman de R. Whitehouse, Mrs. Robert L. Bacon, and Mrs. William Sloane.

Benefit Tea Dance, Bridge, and Christmas Sale at Plaza.

A tea dance, bridge tournament, and Christmas sale is to be given on the afternoon of Thursday, Dec. 11, in the large ballroom at the Plaza in aid of the Winifred Wheeler Day Nursery, from 3 to 7 o'clock. Mrs. Donn Barber will be in charge of the tea dance, Mrs. Phillips B. Thompson is to look after the bridge tournament, and Mrs. William Ross Proctor is to have charge of the sale of fancy articles made by the junior auxiliary of the nursery, which is at 540 East Seventy-sixth Street. There are to be handsome prizes for the bridge tournament, and special dances will also attract. Ticket, $5 for bridge and $1 for tea and dancing, are to be had from Mrs. R. L. Patterson, 32 West Fifty-second Street.

Dancing Tournament.

The annual benefit of the Bloomingdale Day Nursery is announced for Wednesday evening, Dec. 10, at the Plaza. There will be a dancing tournament in which prize contests in costume by society dancers will be held. Supper and general dancing is to follow the tournament.

For the prize contests in the one-step, tango, and hesitation waltz the committee has arranged for a certain number of couples. Others desiring to enter the lists may do so, but entries must be sent in before Dec. 1 to the Chairman of the committee, Mrs. Crittenden Percy, 252 West Seventy-sixth Street. Fancy dress will be obligatory.

The entertainment is under the patronage of Mrs. Arthur Dodge, Mrs. Henry Villard, Mrs. Eugene Trayer, Mrs. William Norman Guthrie, Mrs. Cruttenden Percy, Mrs. Henry Rogers Seager, Mrs. William P. Treat, Mrs. James Harvey Robinson, Mrs. George A. Legg, Mrs. Charles B. Squier, Mrs. C. Valentine Schuyler, Mrs. Henry Foster Sewell, Mrs. Roger B. Williams, Jr., Mrs. William B. TUESDAY TO BE CROWDED WITH SMART WEDDINGS

Keen Interest in Miss Jessie Wilson's Marriage in White House—Miss Edith Logan, Miss Gladys Roosevelt, Miss Eleanor Hinton, and Miss Effie C. Zabriskie to Wed on the Same Day—Miss Ursula W. Brown Engaged.

LAST week it was Wednesday which was favored by the brides. This week Tuesday will top the list of week days with its numerous nuptials. General interest will be focused on the White House on that day, where Miss Jessie Wilson and Francis Bowes Sayre are to be married in the East Room at 4:30 o'clock in the afternoon. Many invitations were received in New York from the President and Mrs. Wilson for the marriage of their daughter, and there will be a number of prominent New Yorkers at the wedding. Magnificent gifts have been left at the White House, including the superb diamond necklace from the House of Representatives, which was purchased in this city. Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Carnegie, who have withdrawn from all social affairs, owing to the death last week of Mrs. George Lauder, presented Miss Wilson with a dozen silver plates. Naturally everybody knows by this time that Miss Wilson will be the thirteenth bride in the White House, but as this numeral has played a lucky and important part in the life of President Wilson, no significance is attached to the circumstance. The first bride at the White House, by the way, was Lucy Payne Washington, sister of President Madison's wife, who was married to Supreme Court Justice Todd in 1811, just 102 years ago.

Mrs. Logan and her daughter of Washington, D. C., are to be here on that day, to attend the marriage of Miss Edith Logan, daughter of Mrs. John A. Logan, Jr., and Dewess W. Dilworth, which is to be solemnized in St. Thomas's Church at 4 o'clock, with a reception afterward at the home of the bride's mother, 17 West Fifty-sixth Street. Mme. de Sincay of Paris will be here for her sister's wedding, and will act as matron of honor. The Misses Audrey Osborne, Vouletti Proctor, Mercedes de Acosta and Eleanor Lamson are to be the bridesmaids. William de Forest Manice is to be Mr. Dilworth's best man, and the ushers selected include Seth B. French, Morgan J. O'Brien, Jr., Arthur Gardiner, J. Macy Willetts, Henry Sproul, Lawrence C. Beggs, Robert S. Patten, Gordon L. Rand, S. Bayard Rives, Sellars McKee, Rufus S. Tucker and Joseph Dilworth, a cousin. Mr. and Mrs. John A. Logan, 3d, have just arrived from Europe. Mr. Logan is to give his sister in marriage.

Miss Eleanor Hinton, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Post Hinton, is to be married to Delevan M. Baldwin that same afternoon, at 4 o'clock, in St. George's Church, with a reception after the church ceremony at the Hinton home, 45 West Fifty-fifth Street, which will be for relatives and intimate friends only. Miss Isabel Hinton is to be her sister's maid of honor, and the other attendants will be the Misses Mabel Hinton, Rosina R. Otis, Ruth Haskins, Dorothy Salisbury, Dorothy Dominick, and Louise Baldwin. Runyan S. Baldwin will be his brother's best man.

At 4 o'clock on Tuesday, in St. Bartholomew's Church, Miss Gladys Roosevelt, daughter of John Ellis Roosevelt, and a cousin of Col. Theodore Roosevelt, is to be married to Fairman Dick, son of Mr. and Mrs. Evans R. Dick. The wedding is to be a quiet one, as well as the subsequent reception at the home of the bride's father, 818 Madison Avenue. Miss Jean Roosevelt is to be her sister's maid of honor, and another sister, Mrs. Stuyvesant Fish, Jr., will act as matron of honor. Evans R. Dick, Jr., is to be best man for his brother. Mr. Dick gave his farewell bachelor dinner on Thursday night at the Hotel Brevoort, his guests including Alexander D. Grant, J. Austen Emory of Boston, Stuyvesant Fish, Jr., George Emlen Roosevelt, George Marvin, M. L. Tilney, O'Donnell Iselin, and A. S. Mather of Cleveland, Ohio, who are to be his ushers.

An out-of-town wedding on that day will be that of Miss Effie Constance Zabriskie, daughter of Mrs. Cornelius I. Zabriskie of Hackensack, N. J., to Raymond Williams Stephenson of this city, which is to be celebrated in the Second Reformed Church in Hackensack. Miss Florence St. John is to be the maid of honor, and the bridesmaids are to be the Misses Lillian Dougherty of Hackensack, Lillian Rueckheim of Chicago, Natalie Rector of Vicksburg, Miss., and Margaretta Holmans of this city. Little Constance Zabriskie, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Frederick C. Zabriskie, is to serve as flower girl. John Stephenson will attend his brother as best man, and the ushers will be Donald Bayne, Arthur Fletcher, Frederick C. Zabriskie, and Raymond Clarendon. A reception is to follow at the home of the bride's mother.

The wedding of Miss Margharita S. Hungerford, daughter of Mrs. William Allyn Hungerford of this city, and Birney Blackwell, whose engagement was announced at the wedding of Miss Schley, is to take place on Tuesday at the home of the bride's mother, 121 West Sixty-ninth Street. The Rev. Dr. Nathan A. Seagle will officiate. The wedding is to be a very quiet one. Mrs. Rufus M. Gibbs of Baltimore is to attend the bride and Frank E. Blackwell, Jr., will be best man for his brother.

On Tuesday evening J. Henry Alexandre, son of the late J. Henry Alexandre of New York, who is to marry

Miss Ursula Brown Engaged.

An interesting engagement announced last week was that of Miss Ursula Wolcott Brown, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. G. Hunter Brown of 56 East Fifty-second Street, to Edmund S. Twining, Jr., son of Mr. and Mrs. Edmund S. Twining of this city. Miss Brown is the great-granddaughter of James Brown, the most prominent banker of his time. She has taken important parts in charity entertainments and is popular with the younger set. Mr. Twining is a graduate of Harvard University. The wedding will probably take place this Winter, although no date has been set.

Plans for Miss Porter's Wedding.

The marriage of Miss Doris Porter, daughter of A. H. Porter of 123 East Thirty-sixth Street, to Harry I. Caesar, son of Mr. and Mrs. Henry A. Caesar of 19 West Seventy-sixth Street, will take place at St. Thomas's Chapel on Saturday, Dec. 27. Miss Katherine Hoagland will be maid of honor, and the bridesmaids will be the Misses Adeline Townsend, Nathalie Slocum, Hazen Symington, and Eleanor McCarter. The ushers will be Purser E. Adams, Joseph C. Hoagland, Edward C. Page of Philadelphia, Kenneth M. Seggermann, Arthur Barber, and Charles U. Caesar, Gray McW. Bryan is to serve as best man.

Miss Weeks to Wed on Saturday.

Miss Marjorie P. Weeks, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Herbert A. Weeks, and John H. Stewart, son of Mrs. John H. Stewart of Pittsburgh and Baltimore, are to be married at 4 o'clock on Saturday afternoon in the Church of the Heavenly Rest. Miss Eugenie Philbin is to be maid of honor, and the bridesmaids will include the Misses Virginia Stewart, Eleanor Cary, Tesson Thayer, Eleanor Nash, Gertrude Welling, and Mary Jacob. William Emery, Jr., of Philadelphia is to be Mr. Stewart's best man. The ushers will include Charles N. Snowdon, S. Bonsal White, Francis A. Lewis, 3d, John C. Weeks, Ernest W. Pittman, and Lindsay H. Welling. A reception will follow at the home of the bride's parents, 70 West Forty-sixth Street.

At Delmonico's.

An exhibit and sale of trade schools is to be held under the auspices of the Federation of Associations for Cripples at Delmonico's on Dec. 2 and 3. The work of the jewelry class of the Brearely League Industrial School for Cripples will be shown. The Harlem Day Home and School, which aims primarily to train cripples who are unable to leave their homes and provides an instructor to teach them to do fine sewing and embroidery, will have a display of many pieces of work. The New York State Branch of the Shut-In Society will have an interesting booth where articles prepared for their city salesroom will be on order. The artisans at work in the shops of the trade school of the Hospital of Hope will show specimens of their handicraft in five trades. The Crippled Children's East Side Free School will have on sale finely embroidered linens for trousseaux, layettes, sofa pillows, table and bed linens.

The committee in charge of the exhibit includes Mrs. Albert Seligmann, Chairman, and Miss Florence S. Sullivan, Mrs. Spencer Lathrop, Mrs. Moses Heineman, Miss Louise Baldwin, Dr. Charles H. Jaeger, Dr. Arthur Ciley, and Mrs. John M. Gallaway.

Tea Dance and Sale.

The tea dance and sale which will be held at the MacDowell Club, 108 West Fifty-fifth Street, to-morrow, from 2 to 7 o'clock, for the benefit of the New York City Visiting Committee, promises to be a most attractive affair. The patronesses of several of the best-known dancing classes have formed parties for the dance from 4 to 7, and several débutantes will give fancy dances at 5.

Miss Ruth Draper has consented to give some of her monologues at 3. A special feature will be the sale of Christmas toys. Children will be admitted free. Admission to both monologues and dance is included in the price of the ticket, $1.

The tea room will be served by Miss Clara Irvin, Miss Adah Marks, Mrs. Henry de Rham, Miss Joan Whittridge, Miss Edna Biddle, Miss Alice Fox, Miss Margaret L. Lee, Miss Mildred Sawyer, Mrs. Duncan Harris, Miss Polly McLaren, Miss Louise Gould, and Miss Eleanor Walker. The men who will manage the dance include Herbert Lawrence, N. C. Jones, George Gilder, George Warren, Hicks Lawrence, Alfred Killmer, and Charles A. Corliss.

Many well-known New Yorkers are among the patrons and patronesses.

Russian Music Benefit.

The Russian Ambassador and Mme. Bakhmeteff, Archbishop Platon, the Russian Consul General, Mr. Oustinoff, and a number of prominent New Yorkers, have taken boxes for the concert of Russian church music by the Russian St. Nicholas Cathedral Choir, to be held at Aeolian Hall on Saturday evening. The concert is for the benefit of the Choir School, presided over by Mr. I. T. Gorokhoff, the pupil and co-worker of Kastalsky, the famous composer of church music, and head of the Holy Synod Choir of Moscow, which sings in the Cathedral of the Assumption in the Kremlin, where all the Emperors of Russia are crowned. The choir wears the same Holy Synod uniform, kaftans of deep violet blue and vermilion cloth, bordered with broad gold galloon, and the wings, which all Russian church singers wear folded on their backs, are tipped with vermilion and gold.

Dobbs Day Nursery Dance.

A dance for the benefit of the Dobbs Day Nursery and Neighborhood House, in East Eighty-sixth Street, is to be given by society girls on Friday evening, Dec. 12, at the Plaza. Many dinners will precede it. The committee in charge, from whom tickets at $3 each may be purchased, is made up of the Misses Lydia Coit Butler, Anna Cronkite, Mercedes de Acosta, Helen Hyde, Louise T. Butler, Elizabeth Kendall, Flora McAlpin, Vouletti Proctor, Louise Trevor, Lois Cunningham, Estelle Romeyn, Miriam Harriman, Mary M. Parsons, Katherine Porter, Dorothy Adriance, and Sybil Young.

The patronesses include Mrs. Edward Dean Adams, Mrs. Harris Adriance, Mrs. Alfred Bell, Mrs. Joseph Auerbach, Mrs. William Armstrong, Mrs. William Allen Butler, Mrs. Charles Bradley, Mrs. Walter Damrosch, Mrs. Joseph W. Harriman, Mrs. Arthur Curtis James, Mrs. Edward S. Harkness, Mrs. William Ross Proctor, Mrs. Charles Romeyn, Mrs. Howard Carroll, Mrs. David Coddington, Mrs. E. Francis Hyde, Mrs. George McAlpin, Mrs. William K. Macy, Mrs. Louis McCagg, Mrs. J. Colby Colgate, Mrs. Everett Colby, Mrs. William Adams Brown, Mrs. J. Allen Townsend, Mrs. Charles Frank, Mrs. C. Grosvenor Wyeth, Mrs. E. K. Dunham, Mrs. Crawford Burton, Mrs. Louis K. Hyde, Mrs. Thomas Catterthwaite, Miss Flora Benjamin, and Miss Anne Dorman.

On Tuesday, Dec. 2, the first of the series of Tuesday Salons will be held at Sherry's. The programme will begin at 3 o'clock, and will include numbers by Leginska, Marie Rappold, and Ruby Helder. Leginska will play, among other things, the popular Schulz-Eyler Arabesque on the "Blue Danube" waltz; Wolff's "Capriccio Appassionata," and Debussy's "Toccata." Rappold's songs include Grieg's "Ein Traum," Puccini's "In Quelle Trine Morbide," and Graham Peel's "Early Morning." Ruby Helder will sing "Inspirez Mol," by Gounod, and Verdi's "La Donna e Mobile." Rappold and Helder will also sing the prison scene from "Trovatore." The audience will be seated at small tables and tea will be served after the music. The series is under the direction of Mrs. Anson Dudley Bramhall.

Tuesday was a gala day for the National California Club. At 3:30 the President, Mrs. T. J. Vivian, opened the programme at the Waldorf introducing the Chairman of California history, Mrs. A. A. Fisher, who told of the origin of the Bear flag and touched on the more recent historically important events in the Golden State. Mrs. Moore McComas in a ten-minute talk on current events spoke of the Los Angeles aqueduct, the New York aqueduct, parcel post, married women as teachers, and suffrage. Miss Adelaide Stedman was Chairman of the day and introduced Prof. Finlay Melville Foster of the New York University, and Mrs. C. H. De Mille. The following Californians were guests: Mrs. and Miss Del Valle of Los Angeles, Mrs. Louis C. Farrar of Sacramento, Mrs. William Waters, Jr., of Monterey, Miss Virginia Vassault, Miss H. A. BALLS AND PARTIES FOR THANKSGIVING DAY

First Afternoon Benefit for Widowed Mothers' Fund To-Morrow at Hotel Astor—Oriental Costume Pageant on Dec. 6 for Stony Wold Sanatorium.

Miss Ruth Winifred Straat. (PHOTO BY CAMPBELL STUDIO)

Mrs. Henri Crenier

EVEN though the balmy days of last week were more suited to motoring and out-of-door sports than to Winter amusements, society sent out numerous invitations for midwinter affairs, such as subscription dances, card parties, and bazaars. The young people are home from their various schools for the Thanksgiving recess, and for them the usual number of balls and parties are slated for the next fortnight. As a result of the general unrest among women, and the increasing number of clubs, the women of the town are turning to talks on current events as a diversion. They give series of them for charity, learning in a semi-social way what is going on and give less time to bridge than in former years. There are numbers of these courses of talks in progress now, with several others planned for the near future.

To-morrow Minerva will hold a meeting and luncheon at the Waldorf. Business meeting will be called at 12 o'clock, luncheon at 1 o'clock, in charge of Mrs. Edward Jenkins. The programme at 3 o'clock will be under the direction of Mrs. Jeremiah Pangburn. Mrs. Frank Cronise's subject will be current events, and there will be a paper by Mrs. K. A. Martin. John Sherwin Crosby will be the guest of honor. Preparations are under way for the banquet and ball on Dec. 8 at the Waldorf to be given in honor of the President, Mrs. MacNutt. The Chairman of reception for this affair is Mrs. Frank E. Hadley.

Mrs. B. Hardnig of 15 West Ninety-first Street entertained the Colonial Club on Monday in her home.

With a number of fashionable patronesses the Misses Hortense and Lillian Jones, daughters of Mrs. Bessie Jones of West End Avenue, will give their annual entertainment for the benefit of the Infants' Asylum on Wednesday evening, Dec. 24, at Delmonico's. There will be a cabaret and fancy dancing, with general dancing afterward.

To-morrow afternoon at 2:30 the first of the two entertainments to be given for the benefit of the Widowed Mothers' Fund will take place at the Astor. Dancing will be a special feature of the day, with professional entertainers. Among the box holders are Mrs. Adolf Lewisohn, Mrs. William Einstein, Mrs. Lewis Wolff, Mrs. Charles J. Oppenheim, Mrs. Jacob Wertheim, Mrs. Samuel Samuels, Mrs. Henry Zuckerman, Mrs. E. Fleisheimer, Mrs. A. Stein, Mrs. Bloomingdale, Mrs. Kruberg, Mrs. Harry Kraft, Mrs. Annette Kohn, Mrs. Bodenheimer, Mrs. Guggenheimer, Mrs. Schinasi, and Mrs. Feirdsam. One of the drawing cards on Monday, Dec. 8, will be a series of moving pictures. Mrs. Charles J. Oppenheim is Chairman of the Committee on Entertainment.

Nearly all the boxes have been taken for the Eastern pageant and ball, to be given at the Hotel Astor on Dec. 6, by Auxiliaries 12 and 17 of the Stony Wold Sanatorium. Mrs. Henry M. Flock is the Chairman of arrangements, and the performance will be under the direction of Manuel Klein. Many prominent women are taking part, and the scene, with gorgeous Eastern costumes, promises to be one of great splendor. Later there will be dancing, for which two full orchestras have been engaged. Boxes and tickets may be obtained from Mrs. Benjamin Stern, 542 Fifth Avenue.

Mrs. Harold George Wood gave a bridge and tea on Friday afternoon in her home, 220 West 107th Street, for Mrs. John J. Hayes, Mrs. A. W. Richmond, Miss Ella L. Henderson, Mrs. John Kurrus, Mrs. J. C. R. Kearney, Mrs. Thomas Cervante, Mrs. George Marx, Mrs. Henry Schlickman, Mrs. Roy C. Whiteman, Mrs. William H. McCormack, Mrs. C. W. Nelson, Mrs. Floyd Reed, Mrs. Bernet Kennedy, Mrs. John R. Miller, Mrs. Nathan Arnold, Mrs. Charles Thomas, Mrs. E. A. Smith, Mrs. J. L. Pyle, Mrs. Eleanor Walker, Mrs. G. Hamilton Robbins, Mrs. Margaret McCord, Mrs. C. H. Stone, Mrs. Walter Moore, and Mrs. Tagliavia. The game was progressive and the prises were cut glass powder-boxes and lace fans. The decorations were yellow.

Miss Dorothy Mack, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Julian Mack of 547 West End Avenue, has announced her engagement to Nathan Ottinger. The reception will be held on Saturday afternoon, Dec. 6, in Miss Mack's home.

Alumnae of the Troy Female Seminary held their twenty-third annual banquet on Wednesday at the Hotel Manhattan. Mrs. Russell Sage is President of the Alumnae and until quite recently these luncheons have been held in her home, but her health is not of the best lately and so her college mates are holding their festivities in the Manhattan. There was a heap of pink roses at least five feet long on the President's table on Wednesday, and these were sent to Mrs. Sage. The Troy Seminary was founded by Emma Willard in 1814. The oldest alumnus is Mrs. James B. Colgate of Yonkers, who graduated in 1838. She was not present at the luncheon, but Miss Catherine Bosworth was. Miss Bosworth graduated in 1848 after taking ten years in the school, beginning in the kindergarten. Mrs. Sage's class was 1847. The color chosen by the college is pink and the flower a rose, and on Wednesday all the tables bore centrepieces of pink roses and loops of broad pink ribbons. The ices were served in French pink spun sugar roses and the honor table was decked with pink baskets and hearts of the same spun sugar. Mrs. Sage gave the money for the new building at Troy, which is now in complete running order. Mrs. Mary Knox Robinson, acting President, presided at the luncheon. Those who assisted her were Mrs. Allen C. Washington, Mrs. Charles Patterson, Mrs. William Ogden McDonald, Mrs. Robert Ward, Mrs. Charles E. Simmons, Dr. Sarah MacNutt, Mrs. Calvin Sill, Mrs. Lucius Wilson, Mrs. Titus Eddy and Miss Thompson. Mrs. William Ogden McDonald was Chairman of entertainment.

At the last meeting of the New York Diet Kitchen Association it was announced that Mrs. Edward Tuck had placed 500 shares of Northern Pacific Railroad stock in trust for the association. This is an endowment fund yielding an income of $3,500, and was given to support the Tuck Kitchen on the upper east side. The association was started forty-five years ago by a few women at the request of several physicians in free dispensaries. There was a need for nourishing food among the poorer class of patients, rather than medicine, and they lacked the money to buy this. So a diet kitchen was started at 136 Centre Street, the old New York Dispensary, where beef tea gruel and so on might be obtained free by the ailing poor. This has developed into a system of kitchens, ten in all, where eggs and milk and food for tubercular patients is given away in quantities. Mrs. Henry Villard, 540 Park Avenue, is President of the association. A lecture course is being given to raise funds for the organization in Aeolian Hall every two weeks on Tuesday morning. Next Tuesday will be the third of the series. The subject is Currents Events; the speaker, Mrs. Jessica Lozier Payne. The association also gives several concerts during the season, and has secured Theresa Carreno for one of these.

Among the engagements announced during the week was that of Miss Blanchette Julien Gerli, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Paul Gerli of 251 West Seventy-fourth Street, and Edwin Howard Bronson.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry W. Jones of Central Park West entertained a number of friends with a box party at the Horse Show on Friday evening, taking them afterward to the Ritz for supper.

Dean Gildersleeve of Barnard College received the graduate women students and members of the graduate Faculty of Columbia in Philosophy Hall on Tuesday. She was assisted by Mrs. Frederic Woodbridge, wife of Dean Woodbridge, and Mrs. Margaret D. Brewer, President of the Women's Graduate Club.

Daughters of the Revolution, State of New York, will celebrate the evacuation of New York by the British on Nov. 25, 1783, with a luncheon at the Hotel Savoy on Tuesday at 1 o'clock. A reception for officers and guests will precede the luncheon. Tickets may be obtained from Mrs. George Thorndike Chase, 62 West 130th Street. Mrs. William D. Martin is Chairman of the luncheon.

At the conclusion of the eighth annual luncheon of the Washington Heights Hospital Auxiliary, held on Monday at Delmonico's, the President, Mrs. Adolph Heller, announced that a whirlwind campaign had been planned to raise $150,000 to build a new hospital in place of the two dwellings which are now used and which are wholly inadequate. About $500 was subscribed at once by women present. The Auxiliary was started eight years ago by 12 women, and now numbers over 600 members. Those in charge of the campaign have decided that four weeks is long enough in which to raise the sum needed, and committees of men and women have been organized in various sections of the city to carry on the work. The speakers on Monday were Dr. James J. Walsh, Mrs. de Rivera, Honorary President of the City Federation, and Benjamin Namm. The hostesses were Mrs. Martin Beck, Mrs. Victor Friedlander, Mrs. Walter Hirsch, Mrs. Morris Hirsch, Mrs. I. de Sola Mendes, Mrs. Isaac Meinhard, Mrs. Benjamin Schloff, Mrs. A. L. Jewell, Mrs. John Parker, Mrs. Sara Foster, Mrs. A. I. Namm, Mrs. Charles Oppenheim, Mrs. J. M. Postley, Mrs. Henry Solomon, Mrs. Julius Sichel, Mrs. Adolph Solomon, Mrs. C. C. Sichel, Mrs. Samuel Schiff, Mrs. Kritzman, Miss Pauline Hoffman, Miss Janet Ahrens, Mrs. H. D. Meyer, Miss Mosler, Mrs. E. J. Meyers, Mrs. Nathaniel Meyers, Mrs. R. H. Davis, Miss Bessie Hyams, Mrs. S. Hyatt Joseph, Mrs. S. M. Jacoby, Mrs. Daniel Greenwald, Mrs. Joseph Kopald, Mrs. Kempner, Mrs. Samuel Marks, Mrs. Aaron Hano, Mrs. Mitchell Kayser, Mrs. Edward Belais, Mrs. E. H. Bonner, Mrs. S. Blumenthal, Mrs. E. M. Black, Mrs. Herman Cohen, Mrs. Max Schwartz, Mrs. Max Danziger, Mrs. Duschnes, Mrs. Gabriel Greenwald, Miss Etta Forgotson, Mrs. George Heyman and Mrs. Samuel Hirsch. Besides the speakers, the officers were seated at the President's table. They are: Mrs. Jeremiah Lyon and Mrs. Limburg, Vice President; Mrs. S. Marcus Harris, Treasurer; Mrs. Wise, Mrs. E. J. Ludvigh and Mrs. Wolff, Secretaries. Three thousand five hundred dollars was the total Wednesday night.

A meeting of the guides of the Emanuel Sisterhood of Personal Service will be held on Saturday, Dec. 6, in the home, 318 East Eighty-second Street. The guides are Mrs. M. Heller, Friends of the Sick and Needy; Mrs. Daniel Guggenheim, Personal Service Committee; Mrs. Rebekah Kohut, Religious Schools; Miss Belle Kayton, Industrial Classes; Mrs. Arthur J. Kahn, Friends of the Working Girls; Mrs. B. J. Greenhut, Kindergarten; Mrs. S. C. Borg, Day Nursery; Mrs. Nathan J. Miller, Employment Bureau; Mrs. G. M. OF PLAYS TO BE READ AND PLAYS TO BE SEEN AND HEARD

An Inquiry Into the Means to Appreciation With a Suggested Theme for a Drama of Local Life.

By ADOLPH KLAUBER.

THE fewest number of plays produced in our theatres at the present time would repay the time and trouble expended in reading them before they were acted for the simple reason that their contents though visually and aurally effective, perhaps, have no specific literary or dramaturgic values. And, indeed, in opposition to the frequent contention that plays should be printed and distributed before they are produced, it may be urged that to do so would be the means of defeating their chief purpose. That, as we understand, is to interest by means of suspense or surprise, neither of which conditions could prevail in the critical mind if the play had been read in advance.

Taking dramatic criticism in the highest sense, no play would be worthy of consideration that could not stand such a test. On the other hand, the reviewer to-day—as, indeed, in all days—must deal for the most part with the theatre as he finds it, not as he would like it to be. By which I do not mean that unambitious effort which succeeds is to be glorified beyond sincere and earnest effort which fails to attain its object, but that plays like other things must be considered from the viewpoint of their utility and intent.

In other words, nine out of ten plays which are seen at our first nights are designed merely as theatrical entertainment. Their producers know, and their authors should know, that except for occasional ingenuity in situation or lines they have neither a present literary pretense nor a promise of any other enduring value. One judges them as one does my lady's bonnet from the standpoint of their becomingness or their prettiness at the particular moment. For fashions change in the theatre as well as out of it, and styles in plays are temporarily passé even as cloaks and suits. In the theatre, too, the style of yesterday, seemingly out of date forever, may ultimately be the style of to-day. The hoop-skirt is not the only thing that comes and goes.

All of which is not to be taken, however, as a confession of faith. For I believe as strongly as any one in the play that is intrinsically fine. And I know that the great poetic dramas of a Shakespeare, the perennial satire of a Molière, the scintillant wit of a Wilde, even the argumentative tonic of a Shaw, remain intrinsically fine though temporarily or permanently withdrawn from the acting lists. The point to be made is this: that though occasionally written with skill and based on some knowledge both of life and the drama the average piece in the modern theatre must depend as much upon the method of its projection as upon its contents. And so it must be judged as it is acted, not as it is read.

The play, indeed, is seldom a definite entity until it has passed through the process of rehearsals and been modified to a greater or less degree upon the suggestion of producer, stage manager, actor, office boy, stenographer, bookkeeper, expert accountant, and other persons in the confidence of the man whose money makes it possible. Now a play that is put together in this way is ultimately more or less of a mechanical contrivance. And it must be viewed with respect to its general utility in the theatre rather than as an art product the value of which could be determined in the library. It is to be regretted that this is so, since a higher ideal in playwriting would undoubtedly be reflected in a higher standard of criticism.

The occasional disadvantage, however, of not reading plays before seeing them acted is illustrated in the case of such a work as William Hurlbut's "A Strange Woman." The author will do himself and the critics in other cities a service if he will have it printed and distributed before demanding judgment on it.

It is a fact frequently commented on in professional circles that most people who see plays, including professional reviewers, cannot differentiate between the actor and the rôle. That is to say, the inferior artist will be overpraised at times in a part which is colorful and interesting in itself, whereas a finer artist doing a finer piece of work will be ignored because his part happens to be ineffective. Not to bring the matter down to the present time, which might make it unnecessarily personal, the case may be cited of an actress who in a certain John Drew production took all the honors, though she has never scored again in all the years that have elapsed, while Miss Maude Adams, then the leading woman and temporarily obscured, has progressed steadily in the affections of the public and has continued to demand a large share of critical attention and approbation. Successive actresses in that rôle scored just as heavily. And innumerable cases of the kind might be mentioned. For the lay reader it will be enough, perhaps, to point out that in successful plays he usually comes away from the theatre adoring and remembering the name of the hero, whereas the villain, not infrequently the better actor, is at once forgotten.

What is less generally discussed is the fact that the actual intrinsic merit of a play is as often hidden through the ineptness of the players or the methods of projection. And, of course, the reverse is true.

As a rule, in the theatre the effect, not the cause, provides the basis upon which judgment rests. And, as I have pointed out, in plays to which the actor, stage manager, carpenter, and producer alike contribute this is as it should be. But Mr. Hurlbut's "A Strange Woman" is not such a play. I do not know that in the period of preparation its manuscript did not undergo the usual modifications. But basically it is a sound play in respect to the fact that it presents a struggle both subjectively and objectively and worked out in the thoughts and actions of people who are real. And that some of them do not seem real, that caricature not infrequently takes the place of character, is undoubtedly due to the overemphasis in acting of eccentric phases. But as the situations were developed, and as the lines came over the footlights, there seemed to be no actual overelaboration of this sort in the play itself.

One may reasonably object to the fact that the youthful idealists in this play come to Delphi, Iowa, prepared to throw a bomb, whereas they might have stayed in Paris, lived their lives, been happy, and avoided the shock to the young man's estimable and aged parent which appears imminent in the story as it is narrated. But that at most is a question of taste rather than of ethics or of drama. The point, however, might have been covered with some grace. For instance, the mother prior to the opening of the play might have been regarded as seriously ill, the son returning, and the woman he loves unwilling to be away from him at a time when he was seemingly in great trouble. Then, with the mother's recovery, some explanation of relationship would have been necessary, and the problem could have been a natural one.

But this is merely one point in a play which is not only dramatically effective, but has a grace of language and of thought much of which does not fix itself in the mind during the natural emotional process necessary to an appreciation of the acted play. These things the printed play would have provided. I, for one, would have been glad to read it before seeing it acted, and I feel reasonably certain that the readers of the review of the play printed the morning after its production, and turned out in the usual first-night feverish haste, would have been provided with a more comprehensive survey of its contents.

In the meantime it is interesting to find the native playwright finding his inspiration in a contrasted point of view which, indeed, provides the genuinely dramatic feature of our modern period of change and stress. Possibly when our fathers and mothers were still young the new ideas were knocking at the door just as insistently as to-day. But somehow the knocks at present seem to have a greater reverberating quality—at any rate, they are loud enough to demand attention and create uneasiness.

Mr. Hurlbut might have pointed the same contrast and stayed much nearer home. Imagine, for instance, the struggle which must be resulting in the domesticated circles of upper Harlem and the far reaches of the Bronx from the sudden effort to introduce into the household the larger, "broader viewpoint" of Lobster Square. There, it would seem, is inspiration for a dozen dramas.

STORIES OF BROOKFIELD.

The death of Charles Brookfield, the English Play Censor, and himself the author of a number of plays, has brought out the usual crop of anecdotes.

It is related that when he produced "Evergreen," a comedy which did not realize its title, he lessened the losses of a woefully empty night by having the "House Full" boards put outside the theatre. This brought many people from the street—casual playgoers—to see what play it was that had met with such enormous success suddenly, and when they had paid for their "standing room only," and were annoyed to find the place full of dreary emptiness, Brookfield had them pacified with boxes and stalls of good position, and in that way saved a riot. Still, there were those among them who, although they sat the whole play through in well-upholstered comfort, protested as they came out that they had been "done," and demanded, and received, their "standing room only" money back.

Here is a Brookfield story which is one of the favorites in the theatrical clubs. During a rehearsal of a musical comedy at one of the West End theatres Charles Brookfield, strolling down a corridor leading to the stalls, came on the chief of the band of composers engaged on the score, and noted that he looked considerably upset about something. "Why, what's the matter?" asked Brookfield. "You look very ferocious! Guv'nor gone and engaged a twentieth composer?" "Nothing of the kind," growled the other. Then he told Brookfield how as he was passing along at the back of the stage he had heard one of the scene shifters—the impudence of the fellow!—strumming one of his new numbers on the rehearsal piano. "Good gracious!" exclaimed Brookfield, in astonished and sympathetic tones. "And what did you do? Go and shift some of his scenery?"

Brookfield's dislike to being interviewed was proverbial, especially if his interviewer was of the free-lance and unarranged-for order, getting "copy" for any paper that might take it—or reject it. He was called from his study one day to see one such interviewer who had been shown into the drawing room, and he found seated there an exceedingly shabby and shifty-looking gentleman, who was extremely nervous and at a loss to know how to open the "interview." The unmerciful Brookfield did not make his way the easier by staring at him in perfect silence, with his expressive brows raised inquiringly, and his fingers working impatiently about a pen he held in his hand—a depressing sign to the intruder that he was keeping the author from his writing table. At last, in confused despair, the poor, unhappy man ventured the feeble remark, "You've got a very fine clock there, I see, Mr. Brookfield." "Yes," agreed the terrible man, with a queer little flash of suspicion in his eye, "yes, I've got a very fine clock there—at present!"

THE WEEK'S OFFERINGS.

"GRUMPY," a comedy in three acts by Horace Hodges and T. Wigney Percyval, with Cyril Maude. At Wallack's Theatre Monday night.

"THE MISLEADING LADY," a comedy in three acts, by Charles Goddard and Paul Dickey. At the Fulton Theatre Tuesday night.

"HOP O' MY THUMB," a spectacular musical extravaganza with De Wolf Hopper. At the Manhattan Opera House Wednesday night.

"TWO LOTS IN THE BRONX," a musical comedy in German by Adolf Philipp. At the Adolf Philipp Theatre Thursday night.

TWO new plays, a big musical extravaganza and a musical comedy in German are the theatrical offerings of the coming week. The first opening comes to-morrow night, when Cyril Maude will present his once postponed production of "Grumpy" at Wallack's Theatre.

"Grumpy" is described as a new kind of detective play, offering Mr. Maude a character rôle. The play was written by Horace Hodges and T. Wigney Percyval, two actor-playwrights whose best known previous work was "Sunday." Mr. Percyval is now in this country, having assisted in the rehearsals of his play. He has been here several times as an actor, notably when he played the kindly old parson in "Pomander Walk."

The story of "Grumpy," in brief, is this: An old K. C. retires after a strenuous career, and is anxious to be left to his own devices. A criminal case comes very close to him, however, and much against his will he is drawn into a vortex of activity. All the old instincts of the legal sleuth-hound are aroused, and he plunges into the case with such zeal that he succeeds where younger men have failed.

"Grumpy" will be played throughout the week, including an extra matinée performance on Thanksgiving Day.

William Harris, Jr., will present "The Misleading Lady," a new play by Charles Goddard and Paul Dickey, authors of "The Ghost Breaker," at the Fulton Theatre Tuesday night.

The authors have woven their plot around a certain type of a modern young woman, who, imbued with a buccaneer spirit in love, endeavors to attract man with ultra and rather negligée styles, only for the fun of toying and trifling with him.

They raise the question whether a young woman who flaunts her sex in ingenuous ways and appeals to the brute in man should not expect to arouse this same brute instinct and be forced to suffer the consequences.

The first scene of the play is laid at a house party on the upper Hudson, at which Jack Craigen, a man who has just arrived from four or five years' absence in Patagonia, falls in love with Helen Steele, a typical house party siren, who has been playing with him for the sole purpose of making him propose. When he discovers that she is merely making sport of him he turns upon her. She taunts him further and says that he would understand women better if he put one under a bell glass and studied her as an individual. But she suggests that the only way he will ever get a woman is by the Patagonian method of smoothing the knobs from the side of his club and capturing her in true cave-man style.

Angered, he turns out the lights, binds her in an automobile rug, throws her into his 90 horse power motor car, and rushes away with her to his lodge in the Adirondacks.

Members of the house party begin immediate pursuit, and the manner in which he eludes them and manages to tame "The Misleading Lady" provides the rest of the plot.

Another Drury Lane spectacle will come to the Manhattan Opera House Wednesday night when the musical extravaganza "Hop o' My Thumb" will be presented for the first time in this country. Featured in the production will be De Wolf Hopper, who will play King Mnemonica.

Associated with Mr. Hopper in the cast will be Iris Hawkins, the sixty-pound English actress; Albert Hart, Eva Fallon, Viola Gillette, Texas Guinan, Flavia Arcaro, Smith and Austin, Ross Snow, Charles M. Hinton, Bertha Delmonte, Edna Fenton and Edith Gordon. The de Sierrie troupe of fifty "living statues" was imported from London to appear in the production, which will also have a ballet numbering one hundred, a chorus of eighty, and forty "kiddies."

The presentation will follow closely the fairy story of "Hop o' My Thumb." The story opens in the woodcutter's home as the father is leaving with his seven children to lose them in the forest. By dropping bread crumbs along the way, Hop leads his brothers part of the way back home, but the trail is finally lost because the birds ate the crumbs of bread. Climbing a tree Hop sees a building in the distance which he thinks is a church, but which is in fact the ogre's castle. They arrive at the door and crave shelter, and are taken in by the ogre's housekeeper, who pities the children knowing that the ogre eats all strangers who come to the castle.

The children hide until the ogre falls asleep, when Hop takes the boots off the ogre, puts them on and escapes with his brothers, leaving the ogre powerless. They flee to the king's palace, where Hop endears himself to the king by loaning him the seven-league boots by which the king is enabled to reach the Land of Lost Memories where he regains his memory, and in return for Hop's kindness, the king makes him a knight and gives his brothers and parents a home in the palace.

The German-American playgoers will have another first night of their own when Adolf Philipp, the actor, manager, author and producer, will offer to the public his own local play dealing with German-American life called "Two Lots in The Bronx," which will receive its premiere at the Adolf Philipp Theatre on East Fifty-seventh Street, Thursday night.

The book and music are from the pen of Philipp and the play is staged under his own personal supervision. The current attraction at that playhouse, "The Midnight Girl," will be sent on the road after its 100th performance on Wednesday evening. The German "Midnight Girl" was compelled to give way to her English speaking sister, who will make her debut next month under the management of the Shuberts at a Broadway theatre.

Philipp's latest musical play is in three acts portraying life among the German-Americans in the Metropolis. Adolf Philipp will appear in the stellar rôle.

A. G. Delamater will make the first production of "The Inner Shrine" to-morrow night at the Bronx Opera House.

The first act is laid in the home of the Eveleths in Paris. The second act is in New York, in the mansion of Derek Pruyn. The last act shows the porch of the Bay Tree Inn, in Lakeville, N. J.

FORBES-ROBERTSON'S BILL.

Forbes-Robertson's programme for his present week at the Schubert Theatre opens to-morrow night with "Hamlet," which will also be presented on Wednesday night of this week. "The Merchant of Venice" will have its second performance on Tuesday night and will be repeated at the matinee on Saturday. There will be a special matinee on Thanksgiving Day, when the double bill of "Passing of the Third Floor Back," followed by "The Sacrament of Judas," will be presented with Forbes-Robertson and Gertrude Elliott in both plays. This double bill will also be given on Friday night. "Mice and Men" will be seen on Thursday night, and "The Light That Failed" will have its only performance of the week on Saturday night.

RECORDS GO AT HIPPODROME.

"America" enters upon its thirteenth week at the New York Hippodrome to-morrow. The unusual condition obtains that the receipts of the twelfth week just closed exceed those of the first week of the production.

PLAYS THAT HOLD.

The attractions which continue at New York theatres are: "The Strange Woman" at the Lyceum, "The Madcap Duchess" at the Globe, "Ourselves" at the Lyric, "The Man Inside" at the Criterion, "The Little Cafe" at the New Amsterdam, "General John Regan" at the Hudson, "The Tongues of Men," with Henrietta Crosman, at the Harris; "The Temperamental Journey" at the Republic; "Seven Keys to Baldpate" at the Astor, "The Great Adventure" at the Booth, "At Bay" at the Thirty-ninth Street Theatre, Laurette Taylor in "Peg o' My Heart" at the Cort, five one-act plays at the Princess, Donald Brian in "The Marriage Market" at the Knickerbocker, Fanny Ward in "Madam President" at the Garrick, "To-day" at the Forty-eighth Street Theatre, "The Family Cupboard" at the Playhouse, Christie MacDonald in "Sweethearts" at the Liberty, "Nearly Married" at the Gaiety, "Potash and Perlmutter" at George M. Cohen's Theatre, "Adele" at the Long Acre, "The Lure" at Maxine Elliott's, "Within the Law," with Jane Cowl, at the Eltinge; David Warfield in "The Auctioneer" at the Belasco, "Oh, I Say" at the Casino, "The Marriage Game" at the Comedy, Ethel Barrymore in "Tante" at the Empire, "Prunella" at the Little Theatre, and "The Pleasure Seekers" at the Winter Garden.

IN OTHER THEATRES.

WEST END THEATRE.—"Believe Me, Xantippe," will come to the West End Theatre to-morrow night with John Barrymore and Mary Young heading the cast.

ROYAL THEATRE.—"Ready Money" will be presented by William A. Brady at the Royal Theatre this week.

PROSPECT THEATRE.—Thomas E. Shea comes to the Prospect Theatre this week, presenting three plays, "The Whirlpool," "The Bells," and "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde." His opening play to-morrow night will be "The Whirlpool."

KEITH'S HARLEM OPERA HOUSE.—This week at Keith's Harlem Opera House the three-act drama, "The Price," which served as a vehicle for Helen Ware when originally produced, will be the attraction. Lotta Linthicum and Ramsey Wallace will be seen in the principal roles.

GRAND OPERA HOUSE.—Richard Bennett will return to New York in "Damaged Goods" at the Grand Opera House to-morrow night after a tour of the Middle West.

IRVING PLACE THEATRE.—"Kasernenluft" will again be the bill of the German Irving Place Theatre for the coming, the seventh consecutive, week. Monday night there will be a special performance of "The Pillars of Society," by Henrik Ibsen, with a special matinee on Friday of "Minna von Barnhelm."

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—At the Academy of Music throughout the week, beginning with a matinee to-morrow, the regular stock company will be seen in "Life's Shop Window," a dramatization of the book of the same title by its author, Victoria Cross. Theodore Friebus and Priscilla Knowles will have the leading roles.

MINER'S PEOPLE'S THEATRE.—The People's Theatre this week offers the "Gay New Yorkers," a two-act musical frivolity, lacking none of the essentials of a burlesque show. In the company are Will Fox and Harry (Marks) Stewart, James J. Lake, Elsie Jerome, "the Parisian Nightingale," Carol Schroeder, Rose De Young, the Raymond sisters, Beatrice Loftus, Julia May, and Eddie Nelson.

COLUMBIA THEATRE.—A new form of burlesque will be presented at the Columbia Theatre this week, when The Girls from Starland, an organization not hitherto seen at that house, will present an original three-act travesty called "Miss Nobody from Starland." The book was written by Hough and Adams with music by Joseph E. Howard.

MURRAY HILL THEATRE.—The Liberty Girls will be seen at the Murray Hill Theatre this week, presenting two one-act burlesques, called "Marriage a la Carte" and "I Should Worry, Says Adolph."

MINER'S BRONX THEATRE.—"The Beauty Parade" will be at Miner's Bronx Theatre this week. Harry Fields portrays the principal comedy role.

EDEN MUSEE.—A specially arranged programme will be given on Thanksgiving Day by the magician, Dunninger, at the Eden Musee. This act, together with the World in Wax exhibition, the cinematograph every hour, and the band concerts make up the programme.

CECIL SPOONER'S THEATRE.—"Alma, Where Do You Live?" will be the attraction at the Cecil Spooner Theatre this week.

BROOKLYN AMUSEMENTS.

DE KALB THEATRE.—"The Five Frankforters" comes to the De Kalb Theatre this week. The cast will include Mme. Mathilde Cottrelly, Edward Emery, Frank Lossa, Edward Mackay, Pedro de Cordoba, Lynn Pratt, Stapleton Kent, Alma Belwin and other well known players.

MONTAUK THEATRE.—"Joseph and His Brethren," by Louis N. Parker, the author of "Disraeli," comes to the Montauk Theatre to-morrow night. James O'Neill, Pauline Frederick and Brandon Tynan head the long cast of two hundred people. There are, besides herds of camels, horses, sheep and donkeys, asses, and mules, Oriental costumes, desert dancers, and Egyptian ballets. Eleven scenes form the picturesque background of the four acts into which the play is divided.

MAJESTIC THEATRE.—"The Whip," the big spectacular melodrama, will be at the Majestic Theatre this week. Owing to the length of the performance, the curtain will rise each night promptly at 8 o'clock.

ORPHEUM THEATRE.—At Keith's Orpheum Theatre this week the bill will be headed by Marie Lloyd, Maggie Cline, and Gertrude Barnes, and others on the programme will include Jack Wilson in "An Impromptu Revue," Clayton White and company in "Cherie," Fisher and Green in "The Partners," Maria Lo and company in "Porcelain," Ray Conlin, Alberta Moore and Myrtle Young, and Leon Sprague and Nellie McNeece. Concerts will be given to-day as usual.

BUSHWICK THEATRE.—Bert Clark and Mable Hamilton are the headliners at the Bushwick Theatre this week, and others are Will M. Cressy and Blanche Dayne in "The Man Who Remembered," Volani and his flying piano, Una Clayton and company in "A Child Shall Lead Them," Chris Richards, Prof. Ota Gygi, violinist; Johnny Cantwell and Reta Walker in "Under the Gay White Lights," Edna Whistler, "The Southern Songbird," and Mori Brothers. Two concerts will take place to-day as usual.

MANY POMPEII FILMS.

George Kleine originally intended to cover the United States with twenty-two companies of the Ambroslo photo drama, "The Last Days of Pompeii," but the success of the venture has compelled him to organize two and three special extra companies in several sections. At the Rhea Theatre here the photodrama is now in its second month.

STAGE NEWS AND NOTES FROM HERE AND ABROAD

CHESTERTON'S FIRST PLAY

His Opinion, as Expressed in Curtain Speech, Seemed to Make the Verdict Unanimous.

According to one London reviewer, the most important thing about "Magic," the play by G. K. Chesterton, produced at the Little Theatre, was the happy little speech he made at the end of it. In it the author said that he had a poor appreciation of anything he wrote. He did not think he could write an article or a novel or a play or a postcard—which might be the most difficult of all. But he did emphatically believe in the opinions he put forth. They were right, and he would like everybody else to believe in them. He himself certainly did. "Don't you go making any mistake about that!" he said with an admonitory wag of his eyeglasses toward the audience.

In his discussion of the play A. B. Walkley of The Times wrote:

"There was much talk of conjuring last night and of producing rabbits from a hat. A hat full of rabbits would surprise us less than the Little Theatre filled by Mr. Chesterton. But he worked the miracle or the conjuring trick last night, and he was there in the flesh, too, all gay and Falstaffian, telling us he had no pretensions to being a writer, but he did want us to believe in his opinions. The joke is—and very likely he knows it—that opinions have as little to do with the art of the theatre (or for that matter any other art) as rabbits have to do with hats or, in Sancho Panza's phrase, cabbages with baskets. The opinions of an artist are his own private business, like his parentage or his washing bills, and it would be impertinent to consider them. All we are concerned with is his art—that is to say, the quality and quantity and form of his intuitions. And, to take the last first, Mr. Chesterton is wholly innocent of anything that can be called form. He is in that respect, of course, by no means original: he falls at once into line with the Shaws and the Barkers and the rest of the go-as-you-please school.

"You never know what he is driving at, for the excellent reason that he hasn't begun by knowing it himself; one fancy, or one word, suggests another a la fortune du pot. Thus the word 'vegetarian' suggests the fancy 'militant vegetarians,' and 'militant' suggests Joan of Arc, and Joan suggests anti-vegetarianism because of her famous steake (steak—Oh, no! decidedly Mr. Chesterton is not particular,) and so on. Then there is the notion of magic. This suggests the obvious question, is it true or an imposture? You take it for true in Mr. Chesterton's prologue with his wizard and incantation. Then you take it as an imposture when the wizard reappears as a vulgar conjurer with his bag of tricks. But you take it as true again when the conjurer makes the pictures and chairs dance and turns the doctor's red lamp into a blue lamp—just to confound a skeptical young gentleman who had been rude to the conjurer. But later you have to mix your judgment when the conjurer admits that though he began as a conjurer he ended by becoming a real wizard, able to call up devils. When not confessing, or conjuring, the conjurer looks unutterable things and drapes his cloak about him like a belated hero out of Byron. He is consumed, you see, by a fierce passion of love for a childlike maiden, who won his heart from the first by believing in fairies, and in the end cures him of his woes by accepting him for a simple prosaic husband after the fashion of everyday mortals.

"Evidently Mr. Chesterton has a paternal affection for his conjurer. He would like us to think there's more in him than meets the eye. He gives him all the posing and posturing, all the best of the argument with doubting priest and frankly incredulous doctor. At one moment he makes all the other men in the room shiver with the sensation of some unseen, uncanny presence. But he lamentably failed to make us shiver in our stalls. We had far rather have seen him bring the rabbits out of the hat. Instead of that, which would have been fun, he kept raising general (and rather fly-blown) questions about the need for faith and the madness of unbelief, and so forth, which really are not to be settled in the theatre. When Molière protested to the Censor who prohibited Tartuffe that the play defended religion, the Censor replied: 'That is my point; the theatre is not the proper place to defend religion in.' Neither is it the place to discuss these questions of faith and unfaith in. Mr. Chesterton's 'opinions' on these points are merely opinions in the wrong place.

"But his inconsequent Duke—who is, related to Squire Brooke in 'Middlemarch'—is capital fun. He is reminded in the oddest way of quite irrelevant things—the French Revolution, the Spanish Inquisition, Mr. Gladstone, and Mr. Shaw—and, well played last night by Fred Lewis, got a roar of laughter every time. Miss Grace Croft looked charming, and William Farren wise, and O. P. Heggie, as usual, a man 'possessed,' while Franklin Dyall did his mumbo-jumbo magician business with due solemnity. But we never got the rabbits from the hat. Indeed, we fear there was nothing in the hat. For Mr. Chesterton's opinions, in the circumstances, went, as they were bound to go, for nothing."

Vera Maxwell—Victoria.

Mary's "Greatest Show on Earth," Seltzer Waters, Tinkum and company, motor cyclists; Knapp and Knapp, the Four Regals, athletes; Van and Clark, Mr. and Mrs. Howard Stillman in "How Dunn was Done," George Medley, banjoist; Lazwell and Rowland, dancers; Ruth Barnes, the Marshalls, and black and white photo plays.

PEASANTS IN PANIC

And German Actor Gets Into Trouble for Impersonating Dead Monarch in Film Plays.

A story comes from Munich of the remarkable effect of a cinema drama on a number of peasant spectators. Frederick Bonn, the German dramatist, it is stated in a message from the Bavarian capital, has been arrested and charged with "insulting State officials." The author, it seems, arranged a film story of incidents in the career of the late Ludwig II. of Bavaria, the monarch who was the friend of Wagner, and committed suicide. A company of cinema players were taken to the scene of the tragedy and to other familiar abiding places of the late King, and the "life career" enacted from the time of the handsome young King's early love romance with his cousin, the late Empress Elizabeth, his gradual sinking into eccentricity, his musical adventures with Wagner, and the rest of the lamentable royal tragedy ending with the drowning at Herrenhinsel.

But hundreds of peasants of the vicinity watched the proceedings with wondrous eyes, and when they saw, as they supposed, their late King Ludwig II. restored to life—Bonn himself "made up" as the dead monarch—they became stricken with fear, and rushed in a crowd to the adjacent royal castle and told the officials there that King Ludwig "was back again."

The film players were at once turned out of the royal park, and it was intimated to Herr Bonn that he would be prosecuted; but he had had time to "drown" himself as Ludwig II., performing the tragedy with another actor, who impersonated the physician in attendance, both men struggling and disappearing in the water.

TO STAGE MASTERPIECES.

Founded by a group of artists, the Théâtre du Vieux Colombier, in the street of that name, in Paris, is a most interesting enterprise. It aims at sincerity in the acting and at quality in the plays. It will give hospitality to French and foreign masterpieces. It will avoid the star system, and insist on equilibrium. The troupe will be habituated to work together, and will be animated by the same enthusiasm. There is to be luxury neither in the dress nor in the scenery. The latter will be used simply to evoke the place of the action, and will be reduced generally to the most simple hangings.

The Vieux Colombier will not confine itself to the old classics, but will choose the most characteristic living and dramatic works among the writers of the last thirty years. The purpose, indeed, of the theatre is to react against the purely commercial drama and to free actors from stagy artifices.

Resplendent in a quaint decorative scheme of blue and yellow, the theatre is a long, narrow hall fitted with a stage. The lighting is happily managed so that the hall is never completely darkened. When the lower lights are extinguished illumination comes either from lamps softened by screens or from the roof.

THE MODEST SHAW AGAIN

Explains in His Shrinking Way Why "Pygmalion" Was First Done in Berlin—Critics Like It.

Since Herr Viktor Barnowsky took over the difficult task of continuing the great tradition established by Otto Brahm, the Lessing Theatre has experienced no such pronounced success as fell to it last evening with the premiere of Mr. George Bernard Shaw's "Pygmalion," writes an English correspondent from Berlin. Almost from start to finish the audience was kept in an unceasing ripple of laughter, and the applause at the fall of the curtain testified that the piece is sure of a long run. At the same time, the production seems to have rehabilitated Mr. Shaw's reputation as a dramatist among German critics. Recently they had begun, with something like unanimity, to complain that his plays were primarily sermons, pamphlets, diatribes, and essays in paradox, and that the laws of dramatic form and development were violated or ignored in order to inculcate a doctrine or make room for the exercise of a mordant humor. This time, however, they admit that the author has satisfied the exigencies of dramatic art. Thus the Vossische Zeitung writes that "In 'Pygmalion' Shaw has been successful with comedy according to the laws of the theatre, which presents no defects of structure and no excrescences." It is the opinion of The Lokalanzeiger that "In this comedy Mr. Shaw aims at comic stage effects with more sureness and in a more compact style than in many of his earlier works, and profusely as bizarre ideas and transitions overrun the fable it still remains within the lines of a smoothly worked out action."

The Börsen Courier says: "The public was never before in such complete agreement with its author," because "Mr. Shaw, without departing too far from his usual manner, has approached that majority which demands from an evening at the theatre something rounded off, the complete carrying through of an idea, and the stage-probable mounting of the situation arising from it."

Asked by a representative of the London Observer why the play has been produced abroad before it has been seen at home, Mr. Shaw said:

"It is the custom of the English press when a play of mine is produced, to inform the world that it is not a play—that it is dull, blasphemous, unpopular, and financially unsuccessful. This news is duly telegraphed to Berlin and Vienna, with the result that the managers there have been compelled to postpone production until another play of mine was undergoing the same treatment, by which time the previous play was established as a masterpiece of wit and brilliancy in contrast to the wretched failure of its successor.

"Hence arose an urgent demand on the part of the managers of Vienna and Berlin that I should have my plays performed by them first. I have at last complied with this reasonable demand, and that is the real explanation of the production of this play abroad under contracts forbidding a previous performance in this country. I cannot pretend that the situation is flattering to London Journalism; but there it is."

ELMENDORF IN JAVA.

In concluding his regular series of travel talks at Carnegie Hall to-night and to-morrow afternoon, Dwight Elmendorf will take for his subject "Java." A portion of the lecture will deal with the Buddhist and Brahmanic temples in central Java; of greatest interest among these is the wonderful temple of Boro Boedor, covering as much ground as the great Pyramid of Gizeh and surpassing in magnificence anything to be seen in Egypt or India. Among the motion pictures will be one giving a complete illustration of the rubber industry. Next Sunday night Mr. Elmendorf will present his new lecture on "Yellowstone Park." This will be the first of three extra lectures to be given on successive Sunday evenings.

VICE FILMS AT WEBER'S.

"Traffic in Souls," the moving picture vice play based upon the Rockefeller white slave report and upon the Grand Jury investigation undertaken by District Attorney Whitman, will be presented at Weber's Theatre, beginning to-morrow afternoon. Two performances will be given each afternoon and one in the evening. Eight hundred actors are used to depict the seven hundred scenes. The scenes are mostly laid in New York and show the pitfalls that are laid for young girls in shops, at the large steamship piers, and at the dance halls by the agents of the vice interests.

WAGNER IN PHOTO PLAY.

Klaw & Erlanger's presentation of "The Life and Works of the Immortal Composer, Richard Wagner," in motions pictures, accompanied by a narration and organ recital, will be continued indefinitely at the New Amsterdam Theatre Sunday, Monday, Tuesday, Thursday, and Friday afternoons at 2:30 and Sunday evenings at 8:15.

JARDIN DE DANSE.

Miss "Billie" Allen and M. Guillaume de Leyer, who comes from engagements in Parisian cabarets, have been added to the dancers who surround Miss Joan Sawyer at the Jardin de Danse on the New York Roof.

EIGHT COMPANIES IN ONE PLAY

To-morrow begins the 64th week at the Elitinge Theatre of Bayard Veiller's melodrama "Within the Law." Jane Cowl and the original cast continue. The eighth "Within the Law" Company in America is now in rehearsal and will start on tour Monday.

IN VAUDEVILLE THEATRES

At the Forty-fourth Street Music Hall this week the management will continue the Royal Japanese Wrestling Gladiators, Walter C. Kelly, the Virginia Judge, Hedges Brothers and Jacobson, Tortajada, the Spanish dancer and singer, and the Ward Brothers. A feature of the new part of the programme will be the appearance of Dorothy Toye, "the girl with two grand opera voices," who sings both soprano and tenor. The "Great Maurice" will be seen, and Hale and Patterson will present the newest steps of the latest dances. A comedy number will be Harry la More, who is appearing this week at the Forty-fourth Street Music Hall for the first time in America. Additional comedy will be supplied by the playlet, "The Dude Detective," presented by Frank Byron and Louise Langdon. In contrast to these two numbers will be the singing of the Milan Trio, who will be heard in selections from favorite grand operas.

At Hammerstein's the bill will be headed by Eddie Foy and the seven little Foys. Broadway appearance of Will Ward and the Matinee Girls, Gus Edwards's latest offering. Others will be Claude and Fannie Usher in "The Straight Path," Dorothy Brenner, Smith, Cook and Brandon; Schooler and Dickinson, Rinaldo, the wandering violinist; Canfield and Ashley, LeRoy, Wilson and Tom, and the Two Bards.

At the Palace Theatre this week will be Olga Petrova, Ralph Herz, Ray Cox, Robert T. Haines and company in "The Man in the Work," by William J. Hurlburt; the Chinese troupe of acrobats and plate spinners, Percy Bronson and Winnie Baldwin in "Pickings from Song and Dance Land," Robert Dore, Jed and Ethel Dooley, and Hanlon and Clifton in "The Unexpected."

Keith's Bronx Theatre this week will have Belle Blanche, "The Prima Donna Comedienne"; "The Purple Lady," a musical comedy, with Ralph Lynn and a company of ten; Julius Tannen, Ed. Vinton and Buster, Francis McGinn and company in "The Cop," McDevitt, Kelly and Lucey; "The Piano Movers and the Actress," Ben Deely and company as "The New Bell Boy," Silvers, the pantomimist; the Harveys, Two Jonleys, Dagwell Sisters, and Montambo and Wells. To-day two concerts will be given as usual.

Four headline features, Imhof, Conn and Coreene, Bickel and Watson, Bertie Herron and Bonnie Gaylord, and Wood and Wyde, comprise the Thanksgiving offering at Keith's Union Square Theatre. Among the other numbers will be Barney Fagan and Henrietta Byron, the Ramadell Trio, Zylette, the Doll Girl; De Leon and Davies, and Brooks and Bowen.

Topping the bill at Proctor's Twenty-third Street Theatre will be Jack Henry's first big vaudeville offering, "Doctor Chauncey's Beauty Shop." Others are Minuto, a European novelty; Gaiety Trio, J. K. Morrison and company in "A Husband's Troubles," Canne and Claxton, musical comedians; Keane and Walker, colored entertainers; Ed. Estus, equilibrist, and black and white photo plays, which are changed daily.

Two headliners will be in evidence for the first half of the week at Proctor's Fifty-eighth Street Theatre, namely, "The Cheat," a dramatic sketch, and "A Day on the Nile," a singing and musical novelty. Others are Cunningham and Covney, comedians; Clark and Jones, instrumentalists; St. Julians, acrobats; the Great Harrah and his company of skaters, and black and white photo plays.

Twelve acts, with change of programme Mondays and Thursdays, continue to be the announcement of Proctor's 125th Street Theatre. For the first half of the week the following turns will be in evidence: Mme. Sherry and her company of Parisian models; Ward Brothers, Jack and Harry, in "Rough and Ready"; Sibyl Brennan, violinist; Bert Melrose, "The Nut Comedian"; Ethel Green, "The Girl from Dixie"; Bert Leslie and company in "The Hotel Clerk"; Lew Hawkins, "The Rube Musician"; Lillian Watson and Frank Hurst, "Two Boys and a Girl"; Ethel Hopkins and Arthur Nelson, "Those Two Girls"; Lew Wells, "The Boy from Boston"; Ethel Mae Barker and company in "Mrs. Temple's Telegram"; Lillian Shaw, "The Vaudeville Comedienne"; Ryan and Tierney, "The Two Rubes"; Lew Hoffman, "The Ventriloquist Minstrel"; Lew Madison, "The Man with the Funny Hat"; Lew Cooper and Dorothy Ricard, "The Dancing Surprise"; Ben Deely and company in "The New Bell Boy"; Mlle. Rhea, "The Girl with the Funny Walk"

MAKING IT UP.

He had been guilty of an unforgivable breach of manners. They were in the midst of their act, and he had the audacity to step on her foot—and if she had not been unusually graceful and well poised—why—she might have fallen. Wouldn't that have been a lovely scene? She maintained her equilibrium—but was indignant.

For two days they didn't speak. They went on with the show, made love when the occasion required it; smiled at one another sweetly in front of the audience, and looked daggers behind the scenes.

"What will I do to make peace in the family?" said the manager. "This constant friction is not a benefit to the performance."

"Tell them they've got to make up," suggested the leading man.

"Then they will hate each other all the more," answered the manager. "You know the old story about making the horse absorb water, don't you?"

"Well, I wouldn't stand for any such nonsense," argued the leading woman; "accidents will happen, you know. It's not his fault that she has such a substantial foundation."

"Jealous," whispered a chorus girl.

"Well, then, hang it," answered the manager, "why don't you help matters?"

For a moment all was silence. Suddenly the leading man spoke.

"I'll fix them," he said.

"Unfold the wonderful scheme, let us in on it," begged the leading woman.

"Wait and you shall see," he answered mysteriously.

The next evening after the performance the leading man was seen to approach the girl whose foot had been tramped upon.

"Miss Dash," he ventured, "there is no matinée to-morrow; I was fortunate enough to have a seat given to me for the matinée around the corner, and, as I am prevented from going, I thought probably you would accept the pass."

She did.

Pretty soon he stepped to another part of the stage where the cause of the trouble was standing, and, calling him aside, put the same proposition to him.

He accepted.

Two very much surprised young people sat side by side at the next afternoon's matinée. They watched each other out of the corners of their eyes.

The ridiculous situation appealed to the girl. She smiled.

"Well, I guess, we're it," he remarked.

"We're taken in all right," she answered.

By the time the show was over both had forgotten that such things as feet existed.

Wise Johnnie.

Little Johnnie had been naughty all day. At last, to cap the climax, he slapped his small sister.

When father came home from the office the mother told him of his son's misdeeds.

"The next time you tease your sister you go to bed without your dinner," the father said sternly.

The kiddie sat in silence for a few moments. Then all of a sudden he turned to his father.

"The next time I want to hit sister I'll wait till after dinner," he remarked.

"Her appearance is not only beautiful, but brilliant. There is about her the atmosphere of perfection, the perfection of what she stands for—the last word of the Continental woman of intellect, smartness and temperament. She radiates an exotic vitality, there is a sensuous allurement about her, but tempered by intellect, and underlying all her nature is felt the steel of her will, that can fuse into a white heat of passion. She is certain of herself, superior in the pride of her intelligence, yet never because of that intelligence overbearing or patronizing in manner or word. Very feminine, a pliant and keen humor, and about her always, as intangible as an odor, the magnetism of her charm."

"The Man Inside" at the Criterion Theatre indeed is a wonderful play, wonderful in its dramatic effects, wonderful in its humanity, and most wonderful of all in the way in which it strikes the note of universal brotherhood, and makes us all one with the sinner and his sin.
Such a play must be epoch making morally as well as artistically, for it sets the star of hope above the convict's door, and lights the whole dark way of crime with an understanding that must lead to a wiser dealing with the great problem of the ages.
My congratulations to Mr. Belasco. He has done nothing finer nor better than this production, which shows how a crime play should be done.

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE

Many Concerts and Recitals Scheduled for Week—Busy at Opera Houses—The German Opera

A GOOD deal has been said lately about the supreme felicity of the German operatic public, in their condition of listening to all operas given in their own opera houses in German. The people go to the opera to understand it, they do understand it all, they are thereby raised to a higher plane of musical and general culture as well as of happiness, than any who have to listen to operas given in their original tongue, when that happens to be other than what is generally called "the vernacular."

It is disquieting, however, to hear a discordant note raised in Germany itself about these self-same vernacular performances. Now, the question underlying such performances is a momentous one, or it would not have been made the subject of so much and so serious discussion as it has; and the outcome of the experiment now going on at the Century Opera House would not be considered so highly significant an issue. The question is not to be settled here and now. But as nothing bearing upon so important a matter can be regarded negligible, it is well to listen briefly to the plaint of Dr. Leopold Schmidt, critic of The Berliner Tageblatt, and one of the leading men of his profession in Germany. What he says appears under the heading of "Original or Translation?" in a volume of collected essays entitled "Erlebnisse und Betrachtungen"—"Experiences and Reflections"—recently published in Germany.

It is not a little shocking to see the gloomy light he throws upon the pictures so often held up to us of the satisfied German operagoer returning home after the performance, having heard and understood every word of it, knowing every detail of the plot and dramatic development, and of the emotions of the characters from their own mouths, in his own language. Dr. Schmidt declares that musicians, critics, and professional operatic people, when they go to hear a new production without special preparation, only very rarely take in without interruption the sound and sense of the words. What, then, can the average listener take in? That understanding of the words that was formerly obstructed by the coloratura of the singing is now obstructed by the thick and heavy orchestration. Only when an opera has had a long lease of life, so that the listeners have become familiar with it by repeated hearing, is it properly understood, even in Germany. But even so, the most frequent repetitions are not enough to gain this result unless the expressive power of the music on the one hand and good acting on the other render assistance and allow the imagination to supply what, it is conceded, necessarily escapes the ear.

It is also depressing to learn anew, on good authority, what some have thought they have discovered by their own observation, that the art of translation, even in a country so old and experienced in it as Germany, appears to be not much, if any, better developed than with us, where so little attention has generally been paid to it. "It is unquestionable," says Dr. Schmidt, "that most of the German translations of foreign operatic texts are miserable." They are "stupidities," "parodies," "actual caricatures of the originals." As the more alert have ascertained about our own, the German translations are even more unhappy for the singers than for the listeners; nevertheless, these things have been sung for decades with no revolt against them on the part of stage managers, conductors, or singers. The critic complains bitterly of this state of affairs. Some may recall in this connection the classical jest of dubbing Don Ottavio's air, "Dalla sua Pace," in "Don Giovanni" the "Bookbinder's Air," because the false accent on the first words of the German translation makes them mean a "book-binding" instead of "a bond of friendship," as they should mean. And this poetical perversion of Da Ponte still stands in the text-books.

In the case of some of the originals, poets have collaborated with the composers whose verses have no mean literary beauty. Many of the older text-manufacturers, to be sure, went about their tasks without any consideration or apparent knowledge of the demands of dramatic singing. But though a very different attitude toward the lyric drama has established itself to-day, the same deplorable conditions still prevail in the translation of modern works into German, Dr. Schmidt assures us, as we know only too well prevail in the English ones. "Bizet's 'Carmen' still has no German text that meets the most moderate requirements; and what the translators have done to Mascagni's 'Cavalleria,' Puccini's 'Bohème,' Tschaikowsky's 'Onégin,' and Leoncavallo's 'Zaza' simply beggars description." Every page, he declares, swarms with false accents, bad German, twisted constructions, combinations of words impossible for singers, badly chosen vowel sounds and sentences that do violence to the musical expression or the rhythm. And in the interpretation of such texts, groans this German critic, operatic artists are expected to show forth the union between the word and the tone, to be "natural" and produce a dramatic effect!

Dr. Schmidt makes a significant comment on the published suggestion of one complainant that Germany should adopt the plan of giving all operas in their original tongues. He characterizes it as impracticable for Germany, but recognizes the fact that London and New York can do it. These cities still have a "stagione," as he calls it, a kind of operatic season. Their opera houses can count upon a much more cosmopolitan public than the German, and are able to secure the services of artists from all countries who are engaged for certain rôles. Therefore, opera in its original tongues is practicable in those cities, while Germany must perforce settle its problem according to the customs of the country and the possibilities of the situation.

Hence Dr. Schmidt does not advocate abandoning the traditional German method of giving all operas in German translations, when they are originally written in a foreign language, though he freely admits that the original text necessarily preserves the unity of the work of art, its style and character, better than a poor translation. He might, with almost as much truth, have said, better than any translation. He goes further and admits that in nine cases out of ten the original text is more conducive to understanding the words, of course, when the language itself is understood. The practical view, as he calls it, compels him to seek a solution of the problem not in this direction but in a movement for the production of better translations, and this, he admits, on account of the long-established inertia, will be a difficult one to promote. It has certainly been found difficult enough here. The present condition of things in Germany, according to Dr. Schmidt, is "unbearable."

It is a painful thought that this is so in a country where all has been represented to us as so happy, so ideal, where "opera in the vernacular" is universal, and where everything is supposed to be so advantageous to the best interests of operatic art, principally because Germans are allowed, or compelled, to hear their opera in their native tongue.

AT THE METROPOLITAN.

Geraldine Farrar, whose indisposition prevented her from being heard last Monday evening, will open the second week of the Metropolitan Opera season to-morrow night in "Madama Butterfly." With her will appear the new tenor, Giovanni Martinelli; Mmes. Fornia and Mapleson, and Messrs. Scotti, Bada, Audisio, and Bégué. Mr. Toscanini will conduct.

Mme. Hempel will sing "Lucia di Lammermoor" for the first time in New York on Wednesday evening. Another new tenor, Italo Cristalli, will make his New York début as Edgardo. The cast will include Messrs. Amato, Rossi, Bada, and Audisio, and Mme. Mattfeld. The score has been restudied under Mr. Polacco, who will conduct the performance.

The usual "Parsifal" Thanksgiving Day matinée will begin at 1 o'clock. In the cast will be Mme. Fremstad and Messrs. Jörn, Weil, Goritz, Witherspoon, and Schlegel. Mr. Hertz will conduct.

"Mignon Lescaut," the Puccini version of the Abbé Prevost's story, will be sung on Thursday evening by Miss Bori, Mme. Duchene, and Messrs. Caruso, Scotti, De Segurola, Reiss, Bada, Audisio, Rossi, Reschiglian, and Ananian, with Mr. Polacco conducting.

"Boris Godunoff" will have its first performance this season on Friday night with Mme. Ober, Miss Braslau, (her début,) Mmes. Sparkes, Duchene, and Maubourg, and Messrs. Didur, Althouse, Rothier, De Segurola, Reiss, Bada, Audisio, Rossi, and Reschiglian. Mr. Toscanini will conduct.

The Saturday matinée opera will be "The Magic Flute" with Mmes. Destinn, Hempel, Alten, Curtis, Eubank, Robeson, Sparkes, Cox, and Mattfeld, and Messrs. Urlus, Goritz, Braun, Griswold, Reiss, Murphy, Schlegel, and Bayer. Mr. Hertz will conduct.

At to-night's opera concert, the first of the season, Lucrezia Bori and Messrs. Lambert Murphy and Dinh Gilly will sing. The entire opera orchestra, under the direction of Richard Hageman, will take part.

CENTURY OPERA HOUSE.

The eleventh week of popular grand opera at the Century Opera House, under the direction of the Messrs. Aborn, brings Massenet's "Thais."

The artists who will sing the principal rôles in the opening performance next Tuesday evening will be Miss Ewell, as Thais; Mr. Bergman, as Nicias; Mr. Adkins, as Athanael; Alfred Kaufman, as Palemon; Hugh Schussler, a manservant; Kathleen Howard, as Albine, an Abbess; two slave girls, Cordelia Latham and Florence Coughlan. The entire production will be under the direction of Albertieri, and Szendrei will conduct.

***

To-night's Sunday concert will mark a departure for the evening's entertainment. The entire opera of "Samson and Delilah" will be sung in concert form with all the principals who appeared last week singing the rôles. The public will have an opportunity of hearing to-night the Misses Herbert, Howard and Jordan, and the Messrs. Kingston, Bergman, Kreidler, Chalmers, Adkinds, Kaufman, Hawksley, Dalhart, and Schussler, with the entire Century Opera House chorus. Alfred Szendrei will conduct.

***

"Hansel and Gretel" will have a special performance at the Thanksgiving matinée. Gladys Chandler will be the Hansel and the Gretel will be sung by Mary Carson. This will be the first appearance of these two young singers in the cast of the Century Opera Company. In conjunction with the opera the International Ballet Divertissement, specially arranged by Luigi Albertieri, will also be given. Both "Hansel and Gretel" and the International Ballet Divertissement will be repeated at the Christmas and New Year's matinées.

BROOKLYN MUSIC.

"Faust" will be given Saturday night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music with Miss Farrar, Mmes. Fornia and Maubourg, and Messrs. Jorn, Gilly, Rothier, and Begue, Mr. Polacco conducting.

***

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music Friday evening, Dec. 5, will bring as soloist Fritz Kreisler, who will play the Tschaikowsky Concerto. Dr. Muck has placed on this programme the first important novelty of the season, "The Tragedy of Salomé," by the Alsatian composer, Florent Schmitt.

***

Under the auspices of the People's Institute there will be a concert by the Ruth Dudley Trio in the hall of the Commercial High School, Albany Avenue and Dean Street, this evening. Important numbers on the programme are by MacDowell and Arthur Foote.

***

The Department of Education gives the first of a series of recitals on the melodies of Stephen C. Foster by the Harmony Glee Club at the Eastern District High School, Marcy Avenue and Keap Street, this afternoon at 8:30. There will be an interpretative lecture on the music by Augustus Ludwig.

WITH THE CONCERT-GIVERS.

The feature of the second evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday, Dec. 4, will be the first performance in this city by the Boston orchestra of Gustav Mahler's Symphony in C sharp minor, No. 5. Owing to the length of the symphony there will be but one other number on the programme, Tschaikowsky's violin concerto played by Fritz Kreisler.

For the second matinée Dr. Muck has arranged a purely classical programme. Mr. Kreisler will be the soloist then as on Thursday evening, and will play two concertos, Mozart's in D major and Viotti's in A minor. The symphony will be Haydn's "Surprise," and the other numbers will be Handel's concerto for strings and two wind orchestras and Weber's "Jubilee" overture.

***

Nahan Franko will give the second concert of his series in the Hippodrome on Sunday evening, Nov. 30, with Wilhelm Bachaus, pianist; Cordelia Lee, violinist, and Alfredo Ilma, baritone, as soloists. Bachaus will play the Liszt E flat concerto and a group of other pieces. Miss Lee will play Vieuxtemps's concerto in D major and "Souvenir de Moscow" of Wieniawski, while Mr. Ilma, who is an Arabian recently returned from operatic work in South America, will sing "Wolfram's Address" from "Tannhäuser" and Schumann's "Two Grenadiers." The orchestral numbers will include compositions of Bach, Auber, Rossini, and Wagner.

***

As a novelty the Flonzaley Quartet will offer at its first Aeolian Hall concert on Monday evening, Dec. 1, a suite for violin and 'cello by Emmanuel Moor. The other numbers on the programme will be Schubert's Quartet in D minor and Haydn's Quartet in D major.

***

Kathleen Parlow is announced for a recital in Aeolian Hall on Tuesday afternoon, Dec. 2. A feature of the programme will be an arrangement by Leopold Auer of Haydn's Vivace, a composition which Mr. Auer dedicated to Miss Parlow, who was one of his pupils. The programme also contains two other Auer compositions and works of Vieuxtemps, Corelli, Hubay, Goldmark, and Wieniawski. Charlton Keith will assist Miss Parlow at the piano.

***

The Educational Chamber Music Society will give its second concert Sunday evening, Nov. 30, in the Straus Auditorium of the Educational Alliance. The composers represented will be Mozart, Haydn, and Dvorak, the latter's American Quartet being played.

***

Further extension of Sunday afternoon lecture and organ recitals is announced by the Board of Education for the coming week, and the inauguration of a new course of public lectures on Sunday evenings. The new feature of the recitals will be the Harmony Glee Club of Brooklyn, which will offer the melodies of Stephen C. Foster this afternoon at the Eastern District High School, Brooklyn; on Dec. 7 at Public School 62, Hester and Essex Streets, Manhattan, and on Dec. 21 at Wadleigh High School, 114th Street and Seventh Avenue. There will be an interpretative lecture by Augustus Ludwig at each of these recitals.

The board will continue its Sunday afternoon organ recitals, and this week Gottfried Federlein will give that at Ethical Culture School, Sixty-fourth Street and Central Park West, while Paul Martin, Jr., will play at Morris High School, Boston Road and 165th Street.

This evening at Public School 101, 111th Street, west of Lexington Avenue, Mrs. Mary Hill Brown will offer the first of a course of four lectures on Wagner's "Ring des Nibelungen." There will be no lectures Thursday, but on Friday the events scheduled are the following:

"Patriotic Songs and War Songs," Miss Kate F. Chittenden, illustrated with songs, by C. J. Bushnell, at Public School 66, Eighty-eighth Street, east of First Avenue. "Folk Songs of France," Albert G. Crawford, illustrated by folk songs by Miss Margaret Hall, at Public School 3, 157th Street and Melrose Avenue. "The Orchestra," Miss Pauline Jennings, illustrated by musical selections, at Public School 28, Anthony and Tremont Avenues. "Welsh Music," illustrated by songs by Mrs. Mary E. Cheney, at Public School 32, 183d Street and Beaumont Avenue.

MANY EVENTS OF INTEREST PLANNED FOR THE MUSIC LOVER

THE Symphony Society of New York, Walter Damrosch, conductor, plays the "Pastoral" symphony of Beethoven this afternoon. On the same programme will appear for the first time in New York Grieg's "Funeral March," in honor of his gifted friend, the Norwegian composer, Rikard Nordraak. Margarete Matzenauer will sing an air from Halevy's "La Juive" and a song, "Le Spectre de la Rose," by Berlioz. The programme will conclude with the Scherzo capriccioso of Dvorak. The symphony next week will be the great Schubert C major. Mr. and Mrs. David Mannes are to be the soloists, and will play, new here, a concerto for piano, violin, and string orchestra by Ernest Chausson.

***

The annual concert given by the Catholic Protective Society of the Archdiocese of New York will take place at the Hippodrome to-night. The following artists will contribute to the programme: Mme. Frances Alda, Orville Harrold, Miss Ruby Helder, Gutia Casini, 'cellist; Miss Ida Davinoff, violinist, and Frank La Forge, pianist. The Philharmonic Society will be heard in Carnegie Hall Friday afternoon at 2:30. This is the first of the Friday afternoon subscription concerts which will not be preceded by the regular Thursday evening performance. The programme announced by Conductor Stransky will be entirely devoted to classical composers, and the assisting artist will be Henri Leon Le Roy, the principal clarinet of the Philharmonic Orchestra. Mr. Stransky will open his programme with the Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G Major, which has not had a hearing at a Philharmonic concert for several years. Mr. Le Roy will play the Mozart Concerto in A Major for clarinet and orchestra. Two symphonies will be given, Haydn's "Militaire," and Beethoven's Sixth, the "Pastoral."

Next Sunday afternoon, in Carnegie Hall, the programme arranged by Mr. Stransky will be the first of the All-Wagner programmes of the Philharmonic's New York season. It will include the overture, "Rienzi"; overture, "Flying Dutchman"; "Tannhauser," Pilgrimage from "Tannhauser"; prelude to Act III., "Lohengrin"; prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan und Isolde"; prelude, "Die Meistersinger"; "Ride of the Valkyries," from "Die Walkure"; "Waldweben," from "Siegfried"; Siegfried's Rhine journey from "Gotterdammerung"; Good Friday Spell from "Parsifal," and the Kaiser March.

Polonaise No. 2 in E flat.....Grasse
Mr. Grasse.

Paderewski will give his second recital in Carnegie Hall next Saturday afternoon at 2:30. This will be his last appearance in New York for the present. Directly after this recital he makes a flying visit to the Middle West, going as far as St. Paul, Minneapolis and Fargo. About Dec. 15 he goes to Boston to spend the holidays, and New Year's he starts for the Coast, where he will be throughout January and February. The programme for Saturday has not yet been announced.

***

The choir of the Russian St. Nicholas Cathedral will give a concert of Russian church music at Aeolian Hall Saturday evening. With the exception of the Lord's Prayer, the "Easter Canticles" by Smolensky, "Creed" by Gretchaninoff, and Lvovsky's hundredfold "Lord, Hava Mercy," which was sung by the choir at the concert in New Synod Hall during the recent convention of the Episcopal Church, none of the numbers of the programme have ever been given here on the concert platform.

***

Under the auspices of the American Guild of Organists the first of the organization's seventh annual series of free organ recitals will be given by T. Tertius Noble at St. Thomas's Church Tuesday evening. The programme will be made up of English compositions. The other recitals of the series will be as follows: Second recital, in January, by Wallace Goodrich of Boston, French compositions; third, in February, by Frederick Maxson of Philadelphia, American compositions; fourth, in March, by Harold D. Phillips of Baltimore, German compositions.

The Sinsheimer Quartet will give eight evening subscription concerts this season, most of them held at private residences. The fifth occurs at Rumford Hall, 50 East Forty-first Street, on Feb. 24. The quartet consists of Bernard Sinsheimer, first violin; Louis Edlin, second violin; Joseph Kovarek, viola, and Jacques Renard, 'cello.

***

Ada Sassoli, the Italian harpist, who has just returned to this country, and Francis Rogers, baritone, will give a joint recital in the Little Theatre on Tuesday afternoon, Dec. 2.

***

Reed Miller and Mme. Nevada Van Der Veer (Mrs. Reed Miller) will give a song recital in Aeolian Hall on Wednesday evening, Dec. 3.

***

The St. Cecilia Club of New York, Victor Harris conductor, will, in addition to its two regular concerts which are to be given in the ballroom of the Waldorf-Astoria on Jan. 20 and March 24, give an extra concert on Jan. 28. The club has been invited by the Philharmonic Society to appear at two of its regular concerts at Carnegie Hall on Feb. 26 and 27, at which the club will sing the Magnificat in Liszt's "Dante" Symphony, as well as a group of three unaccompanied numbers to be conducted by Mr. Harris.

***

Mme. Teresa Carreno's next appearance here will be at her second recital, held at Carnegie Hall on the afternoon of Friday, Jan. 9.

QUERIES AND ANSWERS

Readers of The Times are particularly requested to read the following before sending queries to the Query Department:

This department does not pretend to be infallible. It will endeavor to answer questions sent to it by THE TIMES readers to the best of its ability.

No answers can be given regarding legal or medical matters, card problems, propriety in dress, correctness of English sentences, and values of stamps and coins, nor to questions of a trivial character or of concern only to the questioner.

To receive attention every question must bear the name and address of the person sending it. This does not necessarily mean that the name will be published when the question is answered; only the initials will be used if the questioner so desires. No attention will be paid to queries to which the name and address of the sender are not appended.

Hundreds of letters are received by this department, so that it is obviously impossible to answer all of them immediately. In many cases there must be a certain amount of unavoidable delay.

The National Hymn.

C. M. CAMPBELL, M. D.—What is our national hymn? What is our national air? I find there is a wide diversity of opinion—"America," "The Star-Spangled Banner," and "Hail Columbia" being answers given by different well-informed people.

There is no one official national hymn of the United States of America. By order of the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War, respectively, "The Star-Spangled Banner" and "Hail Columbia" are played every morning and evening at every navy and army post. This gives these songs a certain official standing.

"America," sung to the air of "God Save the King," erroneously called our national anthem in many song books, has no official standing whatever.

Old New York.

J. M. H.—In your issue of Sunday, Oct. 19, "R. F. S." asks for the correct date of the burning of Niblo's Garden, &c., and in your reply you state that Niblo's Garden was entirely destroyed by fire on the morning of Sept. 18, 1846.

The history of old New York interests me greatly, being identified with over half a century of its growth. It seems to me one of the greatest events in my early life was when my father—reared as a Quaker (Friend)—was induced to take a guest and myself to see the spectacular play of "The Black Crook," with George L. Fox as leading actor, at Niblo's Garden, located in the early '60s somewhere in Broadway near Prince Street. Was this Niblo's rebuilt?

When was P. T. Barnum's theatre, or show, burned, while located on the west side of Broadway, somewhere in that section? When did Barnum's show move from lower Broadway, opposite St. Paul's Church?

When did the old East Broadway stage coach line cease running to the Battery?

When was City Hall Park modernized by changing the picturesque high fountain, with its many sprays, to the present ordinary type, and the high iron fence removed, which fenced in its ellipse?

Niblo's Garden was rebuilt after the fire of Sept. 18, 1846, and used as a playhouse for many years. Barnum's Museum, on the corner of Broadway and Ann Street, was burned down in 1865. We have no information available concerning P. T. Barnum's later theatrical enterprises, but believe that they are described at length in his autobiography.

Mackrel & Simpson's East Broadway stage coach line ceased running in 1865, being superseded by the Dry Dock Company's line of green street cars.

The present fountain in City Hall Park was erected in 1873. The original fountain, which was north of this one, was erected in 1842 to celebrate the opening of the Croton Aqueduct.

Income Tax Statement.

JAMES ROGERS.—Now that income tax has the carpet, I am interested to know if I am obliged to make a statement. I am married, and our joint income is below $4,000. My wife has some bank stock and some industrial stocks. I have the same, and in addition some farms (West) and a house rented by an agent to whom I pay a commission, also pay repairs and taxes. May I deduct from my income sums paid for taxes, repairs, &c.? This information I do not recollect having seen mentioned. Doubtless there are many to whom your reply to this would be welcome.

Since the gross joint income of yourself and your wife is less than $4,000, it is wholly exempt and you need file no statement.

In any case, you would pay no taxes upon the dividends from the bank stock and industrial stocks. Such corporations are themselves taxed on their incomes, and to compel their stockholders to pay a tax on the dividends would be to tax the same fund twice. Therefore, all dividends on the stock of taxable corporations are exempt under the law. All taxes may be deducted, but not assessments for local improvements.

Expenses incurred in running a business and money expended for repairs in property used in business are allowed as deductions; also all city, county and State taxes may be deducted, but not assessments for local improvements. Therefore, in your case the commission paid your agent and the amounts expended for repairs in your property would be allowed as deductions, which would not be the case if the house were your own dwelling.

Taxation of Stock.

MR. WOLF.—Would thank you greatly to inform me through the columns of your paper whether I am subject to the income tax.

I own fourteen preferred and ten common shares of the May Department Stores Company stock and have an income of $1,500 a year, including dividend of this stock.

Since your income is less than $3,000, it is wholly exempt, and you need file no statement. In any case, the dividend on the stock which you mention would not be included, since such dividends are exempt under the law.

Income Tax Exemption.

PERPLEXITY.—If it was the intention of the framers of the income tax law to favor the man with a family by allowing $4,000 exemption to a married man, will the exemption apply to a widower with one or more children for whom he is obliged to keep a home, probably at greater cost and inconvenience than if he had a wife? Can you enlighten us on that subject?

You cannot take advantage of the $4,000 exemption. That applies only in cases where the husband and wife are living together. There is no provision under the law providing an additional exemption for persons in your situation. In your case the $3,000 exemption applies.

"Dear" and "My Dear."

LILLIAN H.—Will you kindly let me know, through your Sunday TIMES, the following question: Which is more intimate when writing to a friend: "My dear," or "Dear"? Which is more intimate when using same in business?

There is no fixed rule governing matters of social custom. In general "Dear" is considered more intimate and informal, in business and personal correspondence, than "My dear."

Housewives' League.

MRS. WOOLFOLK.—I am a reader of the New York Sunday TIMES and saw an article a week or two ago on the Housewives' League. I am very anxious to find out something of this organization, so wondered if you would be kind enough to tell me where I could apply.

You will get the desired information by writing to the Editor of The Housewives' League Magazine, 31 East Twenty-seventh Street, New York City.

Tyson Company Service for Busy People

If you are a business man, can you always afford to travel out of your way to the theatre box office to make the necessary purchase?

Can your wife or your daughter find it pleasant or convenient to stand in line at a box office, often in inclement weather, for theatre seats?

Can you always decide a week or a month in advance what play or opera you want to see?

The Tyson Company are amusement ticket merchants equipped to render you the same efficient service as does the department store, now spreading its gospel over the world. This Company has twenty-two agencies in the great hotels, and is prepared to give you efficient service in the purchase of theatre seats. You will not find it necessary to decide a week or even an hour in advance what play you wish to see. You do not have to waste your time, nor the mental and physical comfort of your family by standing in line at a box office window.

The Tyson Company have invested half a million dollars in theatre tickets, some of them purchased months ago, and carry a full line of the best seats for all amusements. You can buy a month in advance if you wish, and have the actual tickets delivered to you, but you can also wait until an hour or two before the performance.

For this service a trifling charge is made. For a $2 theatre seat you are asked to pay $2.50. You take no risks, for before the Tyson Company offer to sell a single ticket, that ticket, with thousands of others, is in the great Company vaults. The Tyson Company have no connection with Tyson & Co., or any organization bearing a similar name.

TOY TOWN
Ready for Christmas!

It's a Joy Town—A Wonderfully Happy Place with a Thousand Surprises and Laughs for "Kiddies" and Grown-ups.

The attractions are so numerous that it would take more than a full newspaper page to list and describe them in detail.

OF COURSE, SANTA CLAUS IS HERE! This is his headquarters. This is where he annually greets his thousands of little friends.

See the Realistic Aerial Scenic Railway with moving trains. This railway makes a circuit of approximately 200 feet, and an electric train consisting of New York Central type locomotive drawing five Pullman coaches will make regular trips.

See the Bengal Tiger—Hear Him Roar

One of the most ingenious artificial animals ever produced.

We have ransacked the leading toy centers of the world for novelties—and we have been wonderfully successful.

See the African Lion—He Won't Bite

Also marvelously real—safely caged for inspection.

See the Cage of Monkeys

These will amuse the "kiddies."

And then, of course, there's a wonderful list of specials in toys, dolls and games of all kinds. TOY TOWN—THE TOWN OF LAUGHS, AND THRILLS, AND SURPRISES, AND BARGAINS.

The Joy Town for Young and Old

Formal opening tomorrow—Everybody's welcome.

VELVET IS BECOMING MORE THE VOGUE AS SEASON ADVANCES

Its Reign Promises to Last Until Spring—May Be Used with Fur or Two Colors of Velvet May Be Combined—The New Wraps Look Complicated, but They Really Are Simple.

THE fashion for velvet does not decrease. Each week sees more of it worn and more of it sold. There are many who promise the reign of panne velvet through the Spring. It is true that the French women who inspire our clothes do not hesitate to wear velvet during every month of the year, if they choose. Velvet hats were as numerous at Deauville in August as they are in Paris in November.

The few American women who went to this Normandy resort with their straw hats, expensive and fashionable, found that they looked entirely out of the picture.

Suit of purple velvet with embroidered collar.

Not only did women wear velvet hats; they wore velvet coats, for there was a very smart colored velvet jacket introduced by Chancel which had a collar of fur and carried a velvet hat to match.

It is strange, by the way, that these coats were restricted to Europe. Possibly they will be worn over here next Spring, but in the meantime Europe will get the best of them. However that may be, the colored velvet top coat was quite the thing, and women wore it over gowns of white chiffon cloth as well as over white linen skirts.

It was at Deauville first and in the German mountains later that one saw so much velvet. It dominated everything so strongly that it caught the eye of the observer as quickly as did the changed silhouette of woman by reason of the minaret tunic

Then Came Velvet Gowns.

After one became accustomed to the velvet coats and hats one was not surprised to see the incoming rush of velvet gowns and suits. As far back as February the buyers had warned us of a velvet season, but we were not prepared for the epidemic that spread over the Continent. There are now places where velvet suits are sold at wholesale for $14, so one can well imagine how popular they will become.

The pity of this condition is that velvet should be of admirable weave and the standard should be kept high; but this is not done, for cheap velvet fills the market. It has a cotton back, it has a rubbed surface which gives it a gray tone, and its pile is so interior that it spots as easily as white paint.

Naturally, in a velvet season we are inundated with the inferior quality; when one adds to this disadvantage the fact that women will wear it who have not the right opportunities for it, one must emphasize the fact that its popularity may possibly be deplorable.

The woman who can afford several gowns can easily afford a velvet suit, but the woman of limited means, who must wear one coat and jacket every time she goes out during the day, is certainly unwise to invest in velvet. She may have a velvet evening gown if she dresses in an elaborate manner, or, better still, she may choose velvet for an evening wrap. Nothing is better. It is warm, it is rich in appearance, and the present weave is sufficiently soft to enable one to drape it with grace.

Velvet and Fur.

Many women think that it is necessary to trim velvet with fur. The mind associates the two fabrics, but to-day there are various ways of combining velvet of one color with velvet of another color in such a manner that the effect is charming; one can use satin in the same way, but some of the richness is lost. Fur is better. There is no denying that fact; but it is not necessary.

It is true that semi-precious furs are expensive, but they do not go well on a good piece of velvet. Raccoon and 'possum, which were once common backwood furs, are now raised to a height which demands a price that the ordinary woman does not care to pay.

Even red fox, which was the most famous of the semi-precious pelts, has become so fashionable since the leading dressmakers adopted it, dyed or natural, that the woman with an ordinary purse cannot afford it.

Using Imitation Fur.

The best thing that the average woman can hope to do in the way of peltry is to buy a good imitation of an expensive variety. It is a sad fact that she often pays the high water price for it because she has been told it is real. One could say of the fur business what a man of discernment once said to a merchant who said he had made a fortune in selling antiques, "You mean you have made a fortune selling modern things as antiques."

It would not be well to inquire too closely into the honesty of many who sell furs. Somewhere some one starts the thing wrong, and you may not be able to hold the clerk responsible for what he told you and what he sold you, but the practice of calling a dyed rabbit by another and a better name is common these days.

The best way to avoid any complications is to frankly ask for imitation fur. In skunk the imitation is good and serves the purpose of any woman who merely wants to follow a fashion and not buy an heirloom. It serves well enough as trimming for a velvet wrap for evening wear, which, by the way, was the starting point of this discussion.

The New Wraps.

The new wraps look complicated, but they are not, after one is shown how to make them, which observation reminds one of Columbus and the egg. It is not necessary, in order to be fashionable, that one should have that line of gathers straight across the back, which cuts the figure in half, and which one sees on half the new coats, but it is a good touch if one can manage it.

The long lines of drapery from shoulder to hem are equally good if one manages to provide enough fullness for the waist and shoulders and to swirl the material over the hip and bring it up to the shoulders in front.

Few of the new evening wraps are long, although the accepted new movement is toward a wrap that comes to the ankle. It is too early in the season for this style to dominate, but when there are two such powerful factors behind it as Madame Cheruit and Paul Poiret, then one may look out for it after the New Year arrives.

Poiret introduced his long evening wrap as early as August; Cheruit only introduced her coat at the late Autumn races. Both came to the ankles and were cut severely. They had no drapery whatever, which is a startling fact thrust into the fashions of this season.

And here is why both coats are immensely important: They offer a new style of cutting which eliminates drapery, and they cover the gown from shoulder to ankle, which is an innovation.

It is safe to say that neither of these shapes will come into fashion before one has time to get service out of the other kind of wrap. It may be advisable, however, to hint that greater length is desired in a coat than many of the shops and dressmakers offer at the present writing.

Of one thing we are certain: that the coats on streets suits are decidedly longer than what women expected. It is true that many short coats were brought over by the buyers, and hundreds more were made here, but the masters of dress, in Paris, accented a longer coat and their models are winning out.

One does not mean by this that the coat reaches the knees, or that it is cut in a straight line around the figure, but it does mean that the waistcoat front reaches well below the waist, and the back drops half way down to the knees. There is no "bobtailed" effect in the smart coat this month. It is excessively broad, and so full under the arms that it appears to be draped, and there is a narrow belt across the back to push up the fullness above the waist line, but there is enough of a peplum below this breadth and fullness to keep the proper proportions.

One of the very new street coats has a panel inserted down the middle of the back which is cut six inches longer than the sides, hanging like a sash to the knees. It is a straw which shows how the wind will blow.

By the way, this coat was part of a suit that had many new features in it. It was a canary yellow Sutherland tweed with a short skirt, a black satin collar on the coat and a lining of white satin with dull purple stripes. It was intended for country wear with a small black hat made of silk beaver holding upright a stiff yellow brush.

Three-Tiered Skirts.

Fashion is a curious thing, or rather the popular attitude toward it. First, women say they are thoroughly tired of certain things, and as soon as they all say it and are quite convinced about it, then they revive it.

I happen to think of this phase of fashion because of the return of the three-tiered accordion-plaited skirt which Callot brought out last February and which the wholesalers copied by the hundred and sent broadcast to the retailers, who sold them at varying prices between $12 and $50. In the Summer the women said they were weary of the model; they saw so many of them repeated on every side they felt as though they were walking in a room of mirrors.

When we thought the last word on the subject had been said, dressmakers have revived the model and put it forward as one of the best for dance frocks. It is often made in canary yellow silk net or tulle. There are three plaited tunics that hang closely to the figure instead of standing away from it as the new kind do. These are dropped over a slender foundation of self-colored satin. The bodice is high at the back, reaching to the neck, has very little lining, and the three-quarter sleeves hang well away from the arm and are cut to points at the back.

Idea from Doucet.

Such is the foundation of the gown. The different ways of specializing it rest upon the ingenuity of the designer. For example, on one frock there is a wide folded girdle of turquoise blue velvet with a pink satin rose in front, and at the edge of the neck and wide sleeves is a narrow band of blue ostrich flues.

This idea was evidently taken from a wonderful gown designed by Doucet in Paris. The material was sulphur yellow chiffon over a draped skirt of brocaded gold satin. The outstanding lampshade tunic, the high wired collar and the loose sleeves were edged with the blue ostrich flues about four inches deep.

It must be admitted that gowns made with three-tiered skirts of flat plaited crêpe de chine or satin do not look especially smart. Tulle or net is newer, and, with the addition of a colored belt and a flower, one gets a rather startling costume for any kind of special affair in the evening.

It is an especially good one for a débutante.

Brocade and black velvet trimmed with white fur.

HINTS OF FASHION FOR THE WOMAN OF TASTE

THE butterfly is still dominant. It is utilized to decorate a charming black and white blouse. The blouse is made of white satin, with undersleeves of white chiffon covered with black net. Across the front there is a big butterfly formed of black lace, with jet beads embroidered on it to form the body. The lace is put on in two strips, five or six inches wide, and the ends of the strips are held out to form the wings.

A dainty child's hat of white satin beaver shows embroidered butterflies of colored floss and beads circling the crown. The butterflies are worked in shades of tan and brown and deep, soft rose, and the hat is worn with a brown velvet coat.

Another charming little girl's hat is a white beaver, edged about the brim with tiny blue flowers made of baby ribbon. The crown is circled with the little flowers about the top, and from each drops a strand of ribbon, knotted at the end. On the right side of the hat is a huge bow of blue satin. This hat is worn with a white chinchilla coat.

Some new handbags are made of silk embroidered with beads. The designs are taken from those on Persian rugs or hangings, and are worked out with faithful attention to color and line with beads. It must have been difficult for the manufacturers to get beads that would so well reproduce the colors used in Persian embroidery and weaving, for the reproduction is excellent.

Garterettes, or little garters for children, are still shown in the shops, in spite of the cool weather. They are used with socks for indoor wear. They are made of dainty ribbon, formed into roses and other flowers, with small yellow centres, and fastened on a band of silk or ribbon about a garter of elastic.

Big china buttons of really garish colors are used with good effect on some of the white silk and satin waists. One, with a vest of white net, edged at the top with a band of brown fur, is buttoned from the bottom of the vest, which reaches to within six inches of the waist, to the waist line, with three big, yellow china ball buttons, each painted with a bright red flower. These buttons give the only color on the waist—excepting the little band of brown fur—and are a good finish.

Women are loath to give up collarless blouses just because the weather is growing colder. Heavy coats make an ugly line next against bare necks. Furs soil the skin, and doubtless contact with the skin is not good for the furs. There are some very good net and lace ruffs and collars that can be put about the neck under the coat and so also under the fur collar to protect both the fur and the skin. One of these is a modification of the little gold-tasseled folded band of net worn last year to protect the coat collar. It is, in fact, the same sort of band of folded net, ended at each end with a gold tassel. But there is an upstanding, boned ruff of pleated lace fastened to the part of the net band that goes about the neck. This upstanding lace protects the neck and the collar at the same time.

Yellow is much seen in these days. Last Spring yellow was first extensively used in lingerie. Ribbons of yellow were run into all sorts of underwear and negligees. Then yellow chiffon and crepe de chine were used for the making of rest robes and petticoats and chemises and night gowns. Yellow waists of chiffon and crepe de chine were next worn. And then evening frocks and afternoon frocks of yellow appeared. There are even some yellow tweed street suits. Yellow is a usually becoming color, if it is skillfully handled. But there are not many skins that are improved by coming into direct contact with yellow. This fact is now understood by most dressmakers. In almost all of the gowns and blouses of yellow there is a generous use of cream or white tulle at the throat. There is usually a touch of black somewhere on these yellow garments. A little black velvet at the wrist or elbow or belt, or a knot of black in the drapery of the skirt, gives character to the color that might otherwise seem monotonous.

Flowers for the hair and the corsage are made of ribbon. Chrysanthemums seem to be in first favor just now. They are beautiful when they are well made. The long, slim petals are curled by means of a wire run in them. Each is fitted with a yellow centre and a green stem and leaves. Some, in a dull, deep mauve, are especially attractive.

Some of the new sweaters in Angora and Shelton have collars and cuffs of fur, and some are edged about the bottom with fur. These fur-trimmed sweaters can be bought for ten dollars each, and of course the prices go on up to forty or fifty dollars. White is always a popular color, and some of the brilliant red, yellow, and purple shades are also much worn.

Bunches of velvet grapes are used in place of artificial flowers on a charming violet velvet evening gown. The grapes are small, and do not look much like grapes, but they are made up in beautiful shades of taupe and wine red and mauve, and they hang loosely and gracefully from their long stems.

Big porcelain buttons—big in diameter, that is—shaped like saucers, are used on a rose velvet waist. They have big holes, two of them, bound with brass, and are fastened to the waist with black silk tape.

There is a menace to the flat-chested woman in the styles of to-day. When revers, much drapery of the bodice, tucks, folds, and gathers are in fashion, the thin-chested woman may go on her way rejoicing. But to-day, in spite of the fact that loose, bagging bodices are worn, their plainness makes them accentuate the thinness of their wearers. A good deal may be done to cover up defects if the neckwear worn is carefully chosen. Wide frills and turnover collars do much to bring good lines to the thin woman's figure.

VELVET BRACELETS

IT has now become fashionable in Paris to wear a broad bracelet of black velvet on the left arm. It fits the wrist snugly, and is held in place by a large monogram of small diamonds, bedded in platinum.

Everywhere one sees this one ornament worn on the arm with an evening costume. It is far more conspicuous than a jeweled bracelet, and serves to cover the ugliest part of a woman's arm, which is the bone at the wrist.

By the way, black ornaments are becoming more fashionable each day. The evening gowns, the black oilcloth rose for afternoon gowns and morning hats, the black velvet bracelet at dinners and theatre, and now Callot is using large pieces of black onyx jewelry set with seed pearls or brilliants to fasten the front of a tulle bodice.

One can buy these ornaments in Paris and attach them to the gown as one would a rose. The effect is immensely good when the gown is of white tulle or white satin, with a drapery of silver lace. Too much black must not be used.

WHAT EVERY WOMAN WANTS TO KNOW

THE NEW DANCING SLIPPERS USED FOR AFTERNOON AND EVENING PARTIES HAVE STRAPS

THE strapped slipper has taken the place of all other slippers for dancing, both in the afternoon and in the evening. Comfort dictated this fashion. It is well enough to waltz and two-step in a low-cut slipper modeled on the lines of a pump. It is almost impossible to dance the new dances in a slipper that does not cling to the foot without conscious effort on the part of its wearer to make it do so. Hence the strapped slipper, whether it goes by the name of tango slipper or cothurn. The shoes illustrated show various forms that the strap may take. The figure wears slippers of gold brocaded silk, laced with gold ribbon through buttonholes in the fabric of the slipper. The next shoes on the right are made with black satin uppers and colored vamps. The next shoes are made of black velvet, with colored heels, and piped with colored kid, under which the black satin ribbons are fastened. The next shoe shows the little tango buckles, which are sold in sets attached to an ordinary evening slipper. The shoe on the right is laced over the instep and ankle, although the back of the ankle is supported with the fabric of the shoe.

THANKSGIVING VEGETABLES

Interesting Methods of Preparing Some of the Old-Fashioned "Fixin's" Appropriate to the Holiday.

IT is almost necessary to have certain vegetables on Thanksgiving at the home dinner. French artichokes and asparagus tips may be all very well, even at a Thanksgiving feast, if it is ordered in a restaurant. But the old-fashioned home holiday feast demands squash and onions and other homely vegetables.

Modern taste does not relish a succession of boiled onions, boiled squash, boiled carrots, boiled sweet and white potatoes, boiled turnips and boiled parsnips. So the ingenious cook must devise ways of presenting the homely Winter vegetables in new ways.

Carrots, Turnips and Squash.

A good way to prepare carrots is to choose those of rich, red color. Wash and scrape them and cut them in slices. Put the slices through a chopping machine, screwed to "coarse." Then boil the carrots until they are tender, but not mashed; drain them and put them in a double boiler with melted butter, pepper, salt, and a little very finely minced parsley.

Turnips cannot be turned into a very dainty dish. The best way to cook them is to boil them in slightly salted water until they are tender, then cut them in neat, even dice and serve them with a little cream sauce. They should not be smothered in a heavy sauce, but moistened and covered with a rather thin sauce, well seasoned.

Another way to serve both carrots and turnips is to wash and scrape them, and cut them in balls with a vegetable scoop. Then boil them separately in slightly boiling water, and when they are tender drain them carefully. Put them together in a saucepan with a little stock and minced parsley, season them with salt and pepper, and heat them. Serve very hot.

Hubbard squash, to be at its best, should be dry when it is served. Some squashes are dry and firm enough to boil. Some need baking to bring out their best flavor and texture.

One way to serve baked squash is to cut it in two, scoop out the seeds and fibrous middle, and bake the two halves in the oven. When they are tender take them from the oven, remove the hardened and browned layer of pulp, and then scoop out the tender yellow pulp. Mash this, and, if necessary, put it through a ricer. Season it with salt and pepper and plenty of butter.

Another way to serve baked squash is to cut it in quarters, remove the seeds and fibre, and bake it. Then serve the quarters, with the browned layer removed, on a flat dish. The squash, which should be tender, is scooped out with a large spoon.

Onions and Parsnips.

Fried parsnips are as appetizing as are baked onions, and both combine well with turkey. To prepare parsnips in the Southern style, scrape and parboil straight, well-shaped roots. Then boil them and when they are tender cut them in two or else in three slices. Dip each slice in molasses and fry them golden brown in butter in a skillet. They should be fried rather slowly, and then drained on brown paper.

To make baked onions, first remove the outside skin of round, moderately large onions and boil them in slightly salted water until they are tender. Then drain them thoroughly and arrange them neatly in a buttered baking dish. Cover them with creamed sauce; that is to say, pour two or three tablespoonfuls of it over each onion, and then strew them with buttered bread crumbs. Sprinkle a little grated dry Parmesan cheese over them and brown them in a hot oven.

Potatoes.

There is no better way of cooking sweet potatoes than browning them, after they are parboiled, in the dripping pan with a turkey. But this is somewhat difficult to do, sometimes, if the turkey is large and the oven is small.

They can be browned in other ways. They can be parboiled, cut in quarters or eighths and fried, like French-fried white potatoes, in deep fat. They can be parboiled and cut in two, spread with molasses and browned in the oven. They can be parboiled and browned whole in butter in a skillet. They can be parboiled, sliced, and browned, with much butter, in a baking dish in the oven.

They can be baked, perhaps, the day before they are needed, and cut in two. The centres should be taken out, mashed, and mixed with butter, pepper, celery salt, and a little cayenne. Then the centres should be returned to the potatoes. They should be generously spread with butter, and then browned when they are needed. They can be browned in a hot oven or else under the broiling flame of a gas oven.

A tempting way to serve white potatoes is to mash them and cream them with hot milk, butter, pepper, and salt. Then form them in small cakes and score them across the top with a fork. Brush them with the beaten yolk of egg and brown them in the oven just before serving.

TABLE DECORATIONS FOR THANKSGIVING

THE preparation of the Thanksgiving table is always delightful.

The traditions and customs that cluster about the day are so full of suggestions that no one need be at a loss for an idea, and the results obtained from the use of fruit and vegetables and other appropriate sorts of decoration, are so good that the time passed in working out an idea is time well spent.

The pumpkin may be taken as the keynote of the decorations.

For the centrepiece, hollow out a big yellow pumpkin, after cutting off the top. Line the inside of the pumpkin with white tissue paper and then fill it with fruit—bananas, rosy red and shining green apples, grapes of several sorts, pears, and oranges.

At each place there can be a small pumpkin filled with salted nuts. These small pumpkins can be made from oranges, from which a top slice has been cut and the centre removed. They can also be bought in the form of little boxes for bonbons or nuts.

The place cards can be little pumpkins; or they can be plain white cards, on which the names are written, each pierced by a small pumpkin-headed stick pin.

Pumpkin vines are sold by the yard—made, of course, of tissue paper—and these can be festooned about the dining room and even about the edge of the table to carry out the pumpkin idea.

Vegetables for Decoration.

Vegetables can be used for decoration. The centrepiece can be formed of vegetables piled up in the centre of the table. Carrots, turnips, parsnips, sweet and white potatoes, celery tops, a red and a green cabbage, can all be used if they are scrubbed clean and wiped dry. Their colors are beautiful, and if they are neatly mounded and then edged with a border of fresh, green parsley they will be quite effective.

The Turkey.

A big paper turkey, that costs about a dollar and a quarter, filled with candies, might serve as the centrepiece, and at each place could be placed small paper turkeys, also filled with candy, which cost from 15 to 25 cents a piece.

There are small fruit boxes, sold filled with candies by some confectioners, that are also attractive favors.

More useful favors can be found in the small silk fruits and vegetables that are sold for prices that range from 25 cents to $1. Carrots and parsnips, apples, and pears are included in these fruits and vegetables, and they are all pincushions. The tiny vegetable memories that sell for 15 cents each and the tiny wax vegetables and fruits that cost 10 or 15 cents also make appropriate and acceptable favors.

WHERE IS THIRTY? AGE THAT INTERESTS AND ALSO BAFFLES

WHO is thirty? Where is thirty? What is the mystery that somehow surrounds this age?

"Wanted, a woman under thirty." That is a form of want ad often inserted in the columns advertising for cloak models, social secretaries, or general housework servants of the type that are in search of a good home and plenty of work rather than lavish wages.

Napoleon, just before he married Josephine—and he was 26 or 27 at that time—proposed to a woman who acknowledged herself old enough to be his mother. Therefore she must have been nearer forty than thirty."

"A woman's age doesn't interest me," said Napoleon, "if she doesn't look over thirty."

"A woman is never dangerous until she is thirty," says a sophisticated judge of the fair sex. He does not explain just what he means. But many a woman of twenty-nine has stepped gayly into thirty with his verdict in view. It was well worth losing another year of youth in order to see what it felt like to be dangerous.

In the old days an unmarried woman was called an old maid by the time she was 23 or 24. To-day 30 seems to be the boundary between young womanhood and old maidhood.

The boundary of each decade is marked with importance. The octogenarian is revered. Threescore and ten is man's fabled age. The child longs to be 10 years old, and the young girl looks on 20 as the jumping-off place. But 30 is marked with even greater importance than the others.

The age that vaguely marks off spinsterhood, the age beyond which a woman is dangerous, the age under which a woman is still pliable and adaptable enough to be molded into the shape designated in the want ads, the age beyond which a woman may safely go if she takes her youthful looks with her—that is 30.

As a matter of fact, most women are more attractive at 30 than they ever have been before. There is a certain type of beauty which develops to the full when a woman is 18 or 20, and is faded almost past recognition by the time she is 30. But most women are improved in looks by years—up to a certain point.

Intellectually, surely, a woman is far more interesting at 30 than at 20. Unless she has been overworked or overburdened her mind has had a chance to develop and expand, her point of view has had a chance to grow and become stable, and her philosophy of life, whatever it may be, has had a chance to formulate into something tangible.

So, if you are nearing this interesting age, take the bull by the horns. Rush gayly into the decade between 30 and 40. Do not fib about it. Do not waste time lamenting the flight of the years. Remember that 30 is a more interesting age than 20, and that Napoleon, the connoisseur, objected not to the years—unless a woman looked them.

MODJESKA AND YOUTH.

MODJESKA, the famous Polish actress who charmed our mothers and fathers, retained her youthful looks and spirit until middle age.

When she was about 50 years old some one asked her the secret of keeping young.

"I take a hot bath every night," said the actress, "and a long, sound sleep. Then I eat a light breakfast, a hearty dinner at 2, tea and bread at 5, and supper after the performance. I am a great believer in soap and water and plenty of sleep.

"After all, it is none of these outside aids that keep one young. Keeping young inside is what counts."

Of course some persons would argue that a cold bath every morning and no supper in the middle of the night would lead to health and youthful looks. But Modjeska's advice goes to prove that every woman must work out a course of life that agrees with her and then stick to it. Her occupation and tastes and constitution must all be taken into account. Then her rule must be formulated, tried, corrected and lived up to.

Youth seemed to be hereditary with Modjeska. It is said that when her old mother—a simple mountaineer in Poland—was 75, her children took her a set of woolen underwear. The old lady wore the garments from morning till night. At night she cried, and asked to be allowed to take them off.

"But they are good for you," said the children.

"But," said the old woman, "if I wear those wooly things now, what shall I wear when I am old?"

ORIGINALITY PAYS.

NOWHERE is the ingenuity of the present age more apparent than in the begging letters received by rich men," was the remark of a private secretary.

"I have been reading letters of that kind by the hundred for the last fifteen years. Formerly all begging letters sounded alike. They had such a stereotyped air that they might have been copied verbatim from a ready letter writer. Now the writers display originality. They may want the same old things that their predecessors wanted, but they ask for them in a different way.

"People in need have acquired the art of expressing themselves forcibly. That is to their advantage. It may be unjust, but usually it is the letter that hits the rich man hardest that brings a favorable reply. The writer may not really need assistance nearly so badly as some timid person who can't get away from commonplace phrases, but he can get the relief asked much more readily."

DOUBLY SAVED.

I HAD that bad a pain in me chest that I could scarcely breathe," said the convert who was testifying to the power of saving grace. "My heart and lungs was just about played out," said his successor, while a third affirmed that his back and liver had seemed hopelessly damaged when he espoused the faith.

"I say," whispered the medical student to his friend, the city missionary, "what is this, anyhow? A religious meeting or a clinic?"

"It is primarily a religious service," said the missionary, "but those fellows will interlard their spiritual experiences with an account of the physical ills that beset them at the time of conversion.

"There is no way on earth to stop them. I have tried it, but the minute I call a halt on their medical discourse they dry up about their spiritual development. On stormy nights when the fellows gathered here best realize how much they have to be thankful for the record of their past aches and pains can beat any clinic in the town."

CHRISTMAS NUMBER OF THE NEW YORK TIMES

SUNDAY, DEC. 7, 1913

Two remarkable pictorial sections, one in three colors and the other printed by the new German rotogravure process, will distinguish the Christmas Number of The New York Times. The edition will be unique. As it is sure to be sold out ahead of time, the only way to get a copy will be to place your order early.

"THE PROPHETS"

John S. Sargent's Famous Mural Paintings, in Three Colors.

These paintings by John S. Sargent are one of the chief features of the Boston Public Library. They will be reproduced in the original colors on special super-paper, by the same process which was used when Abbey's "Holy Grail" and the Morgan pictures were issued by The New York Times. The complete frieze, as reproduced, is in three parts, 55 inches long and 10 inches wide. It will be suitable for framing, as there is no printing on the back. The picture is equal to anything ever offered in Christmas publications costing fifty cents and a dollar.

THE GIRL OF TO-DAY

29 Photographs of Typical American Girls, in an Eight-Page Section.

To reproduce these photographs, the new German method of illustration, which is known as the rotogravure process, will be used for the first time in an eight-page section of an American newspaper. The twenty-nine photographs were selected by seven well-known artists from hundreds which had been submitted after The Times asked its readers for pictures of young women whom they considered typical of the American girl. So many attractive photographs were found by the judges, in fact, that it was decided not to limit the choice to the twenty-nine as originally planned. The artists selected ninety altogether. The remaining sixty-one will be reproduced in a second rotogravure section on Dec. 14—one week after the Christmas number. Soon after the beginning of the year the rotogravure process will be used in all the regular pictorial sections of The Times.

The special sections containing the Sargent paintings and The Girl of To-day photographs will be issued in addition to the regular Sunday Pictorial Section, which all readers of The New York Times have come to know as an unequaled illustrated review of current events.

The Christmas Number, therefore, will include three distinctive pictorial sections—one in colors, one in rotogravure, and one in half-tone—each representing the highest type of a modern method of the illustrating art. The issue will be unique among newspaper publications.

Christmas Number of The New York Times

SUNDAY, DEC. 7, 1913.

WARNING

When issuing previous Special Editions, The New York Times urged its readers to place their orders in advance, but thousands disregarded the warnings and were unable to get the editions. The Christmas Number of two weeks hence is sure to be sold out far in advance. Unless you order early, you will be unable to get a copy.

DEAL INVOLVES $1,000,000

Investor Buys the Micquelon Apartment on Upper West Side—Midtown Property in Part Payment.

A $1,000,000 deal involving two choice parcels in the upper east side residential section closed the real estate market in an active manner yesterday. W. Emlen Roosevelt sold the large plot on the southeast corner of Park Avenue and Fifty-fourth Street, 100 feet on the avenue by 115, to the Putnam Construction Company, of which Samuel A. Herzog is President. The corner is occupied by six old houses and was accumulated by Mr. Roosevelt a year ago.

In exchange for this plot Mr. Roosevelt took the recently completed twelve-story apartment house at 68 and 70 East Eighty-sixth Street, between Park and Madison Avenues, covering a plot 63.10 by 102.2 feet. The Putnam Construction Company is having plans prepared to improve the Park Avenue corner with a high-class apartment costing about $500,000.

The combined value of the two parcels in the deal aggregated close to $1,000,000. Henry D. Winans & May were the brokers negotiating the deal.

The Micquelon in $200,000 Trade.

The Micquelon, a six-story apartment house at 206 to 210 West Ninety-ninth Street, has been sold by Isaac Polstein to an investor. The structure, which occupies a plot 62.6 by 97 feet, was completed about five years ago. In part payment the buyer gave a private dwelling on West Forty-third Street that has been converted into stores and lofts. About $200,000 was involved in the transaction.

Chapel in a Residence Block.

The Church of the Divine Inspiration of America, understood to be a new congregation, has taken a four-year lease of the four-story dwelling, 324 West Seventy-sixth Street, near Riverside Drive, owned by Mrs. E. Monroe Hand.

The house occupies a lot 22 by 102.2 and is to be extensively altered and converted into a chapel at an estimated cost of $15,000.

Geoghegan Estate Sells Stable.

The H. M. Weill Company sold for Christian Tieljen and Mr. Connors of Buffalo, as trustees for the P. A. Geoghegan estate, to a client, 341-3 West Thirty-sixth Street, a seven-story stable on a plot 26 by 100.

Brooklyn.

The H. M. Weill Company sold 473 Union Street, a four-story tenement, for the Lawyers' Mortgage Company to Antonio Silano. The same firm also sold 162 Hawthorne Street, an eleven-room cottage, for Mr. Hover to a client.

Long Island.

Mrs. William H. Clark has purchased the Mary L. Ellard estate at Great Neck for about $30,000. I. G. Wolf of Great Neck negotiated the sale.

Staten Island Purchase.

H. C. Senior & Co. have sold for Margaret Mulligan, the two-and-one-half story dwelling on plot 100 by 100 at 42 Clinton Avenue, New Brighton, S. I., to Rachel Singer.

Westchester County.

The Anderson Realty Company sold in Mount Vernon for Anna Starr Bell the residence at 328 Langdon Avenue; for Louise G. Parker, residence at 106 Overlook Street, Chester Hill, and for Charles Flomm of the City of New York, a new residence in Chester Hill Park.

Buys Newark Factory Site.

Louis Schlesinger has sold the property at 18 to 22 Magnolia Street and at 14 and 16 Highland Street, Newark, for Joseph Metzler to Henri Picard of New York City. It has a frontage of 75 feet on Magnolia Street and 145 on Highland Street, with a depth of about 145, comprising about 15,000 square feet, and is occupied by several frame buildings.

The plot adjoins the factory of the Belgium American Fur Cutting Company, and it is contemplated to erect an addition to the present plant in the near future.

C. K. G. Billings Leases Estate.

Colgate Hoyt has leased to C. K. G. Billings his estate at Centre Island, Oyster Bay. F. S. Willard & Co. were the brokers.

Commercial Leases.

Burrows Neely & Co. have leased the premises at 738 Lexington Avenue for a long term of years, and will improve the property with a modern building.

The Willard S. Burrows Company has leased for Annie Biehn 427 Seventh Avenue for a period of twenty years at an aggregate rental of about one hundred thousand dollars. This property immediately adjoins 425 Seventh Avenue, which was leased to the Childs Company a few years ago by the same brokers, and a similar improvement to this property is contemplated.

Realty Notes.

The Sixth Avenue-Twenty-third Street Company has been incorporated at Albany with a capital of $300, and Jerome H. Buck, Alexander M. Powell, and William Van Wyck as directors, to take over the former Kesner store property at the above address. The present structure will be subdivided into stores and lofts.

Builders Expect Busy Winter.

Queens builders will experience an unusually busy Winter season, judging by the applications for permits made during the past week. The total estimated cost of operations for the week was $281,274. There were seventy-four applications for new buildings of an estimated cost of $236,803, thirty applications for alterations of an estimated cost of $16,735, and thirty-five applications for plumbing permits of an estimated cost of $28,649.

HOME IN NORTH AVENUE SECTION OF NEW ROCHELLE

There are many indications that the coming season is going to be a particularly bright and active one for Westchester County. The transit and road improvements of the past two years have added materially to the popularity and accessibility of many suburban sections, and the benefit of these improvements are being realized in the steadily increasing demand for homes in well-established developments.

In preparation for the new season and as a means of bringing direct information of what Westchester County has to offer in everything that goes to make living comfortable, the Country Life Permanent Exposition, of which announcement was made some time ago, will be opened early next month on one of the great floors of the new Grand Central Station. The exhibit will occupy a space of about 18,500 square feet on the third floor front of the main building facing Forty-second Street from Vanderbilt Avenue to Depew Place.

In addition to this exhibit which will present in a concise and practical manner models and plans of residential communities in many parts of the county, there are several other things of more than ordinary interest to the present as well as prospective dwellers in Westchester. A very important one is the fact that work is expected to begin in a short time on the construction of the subway and elevated lines from their present terminals to the city line at Mount Vernon. Bids will be received this week by the Public Service Commission for the construction of the subway from its present terminal at 180th Street at West Farms, and the elevated road extension from 177th Street at Fordham. The extended subway line will run parallel for a short distance with the New York, Westchester & Boston Railroad, and then branch toward the west through the Williamsbridge district to the White Plains Road, and will follow that thoroughfare to the Mount Vernon line at 241st Street.

The elevated extension will run up to Gun Hill Road and then branch eastward, meeting the subway extension at White Plains Road, and from that point the two lines will be merged on a three-track system to the Mt. Vernon line. The transportation committee of the Westchester County Chamber of Commerce has received assurances that these important additional transit lines will be completed within a year or eighteen months.

At Mt. Vernon and White Plains work is progressing on the new railroad station improvements on the Harlem division of the New York Central. It was learned last week that the plans are practically completed and that bids will be opened for the construction of the new stations within the next month. A new station at White Plains has long been needed, and Mt. Vernon, despite its rapid growth, is still using on the Harlem division one of the archaic wooden structures which were such familiar railroad sights a generation or more ago.

In Yonkers one of the most interesting things to the business community is the preparation for erecting the Federal building. Several sites were inspected by the Government officials some time ago, and the block bounded by Buena Vista Avenue, Neperhan, Market, and Main Streets has practically been determined upon. That is, it is believed that eventually the Government will take the entire block, but for the present only a portion will be purchased as the appropriation of $250,000 will not be sufficient to acquire the whole plot and erect the structure. The intention is to have the Federal building so designed that additions may be made in the future on the adjoining property which may be acquired as the demand arises for more room.

The Westchester County exhibit, which will be opened next month, is being planned on an artistic and picturesque basis. It is a free exhibition, the prevailing idea being one of education for those who are willing to take a little time in inspecting and studying some of the important phases of country life. It is a big problem and is opening new questions all the time.

As a decorative feature five scenic paintings, each 42 feet long by 8 feet wide, are being installed. The first will represent the Hudson River with Yonkers in the foreground. The second will show the rolling and hilly character of the country along the Putnam division of the New York Central, especially in the vicinity of the Pocantico Hills. The third will be a typical view on the Harlem division, showing in an ideal manner the completed Bronx Parkway. The fourth will portray the fields and rolling country traversed by the New York, Westchester & Boston, with the country place of the late Whitelaw Reid in the background. The fifth will be a view of Long Island Sound at Oakland Beach.

A model house will show a model kitchen with all the latest appliances, a model bathroom, &c. Unusual furniture will be shown, as well as unique house equipment. There will also be a sporting booth showing camp life and up-to-date equipment. A model farmhouse, stable, and outbuildings will also be shown, the purpose of the model being to attract New York City dwellers to farm ownership and development.

The increasing demand for homes at Greenacres has been so great that the Fall season found practically everything taken. Foundations have been laid for four new houses. During the last three years over forty attractive residences, costing from $8,000 to $15,000 each, have been built. The development is now practically confined to the north end of Greenacres, the southern section having been almost entirely improved.

The School Board of Scarsdale has secured an option from the Scarsdale Estates upon a plot of four acres adjoining Greenacres for the construction of a model school. It is expected that the matter will be submitted to the taxpayers early in December.

An evidence of rapid construction in the Scarsdale section has been shown in the rebuilding of the Scarsdale Golf and Country clubhouse, which replaces the one recently destroyed by fire. It follows the same lines as the old house with the exception of larger locker spaces and kitchen equipment, as well as a spacious piazza. The property is owned by the Scarsdale Estates, which has been responsible in a large measure for the development of the section. At the north end of Scarsdale, opposite the club, is the Greenacres development.

The recent opening of the Gedney Farm Hotel, just outside of White Plains, has been an important event for that growing section of the country. On the property around the hotel several well-designed houses are in process of construction for occupancy next season. The new apartment building just opened at Bronxville near the Gramatan Hotel is well rented, and reveals a steady apartment house demand in a popular rural community.

That troublesome but important matter of encroachment has invaded the limits of Bronxville, and in a decision recently rendered by the Supreme Court the future usefulness of the Arcade block and the Hotel Gramatan Arcade buildings is imperiled, as the contention of the village is upheld that they encroach upon the highway. The case, it is said, will be appealed. In his decision, Justice Tompkins suggests a compromise, saying:

"The effect of such a judgment, if enforced, will mean the destruction of two very valuable buildings that are ornaments to the village, the destruction of which will disfigure its principal thoroughfare, i. e., Pondfield Road, and at the same time will entail very large cost and damage to the defendant, without corresponding benefit to the village, and it seems to me that the parties to this action should agree that the present street be made of sufficient width to accommodate its present and future traffic by the removal of the Arcade building only, or so much thereof as may be necessary to accomplish that end, without interfering with the Gramatan Inn Building."

CITY-PLANNING EXHIBITION.

Addresses by Mayor-Elect and City Officials in Public Library.

George McAneny, Borough President and Chairman of the Heights of Buildings Committee, will formally open the City-Planning Exhibition, to be given by the City of New York and the Merchants' Association, in the Public Library, Fifth Avenue and Forty-second Street, at 5 o'clock to-morrow afternoon. Mr. McAneny will speak, and in addition addresses are expected by Borough Presidents Lewis H. Pounds and Cyrus C. Miller, both members of the committee.

To-day there will be a private view of the exhibition, to which Mayor Kline and other city officials have been invited. Tuesday will be Merchants' Association day. In the afternoon President William A. Marble of the association has been asked to deliver a lecture. On the last day John Purroy Mitchel, Mayor-elect, has been asked to be the guest of honor and will deliver a lecture.

New Hospital for Flushing.

Flushing is to have a new hospital, two stories in height, 75 by 63, for contagious diseases, under the supervision and maintenance of the city. It will cost $95,000, and will be located south of Flushing, at Lott's Lane, on property owned by the city for some time.

40,000 Tenements in Manhattan.

There are 44,000 apartment houses and tenements in Brooklyn, 40,000 in Manhattan, and 6,000 in Richmond. Forty per cent. of all the buildings in New York City were erected as one-family dwellings.

WHERE BUILDING IS ACTIVE.

Philadelphia Ahead of Its 1912 Record.

It should be a reason for encouragement to builders and operators of New York, where building construction has suffered a severe cramp during the last few months, to know that there is one neighboring city that is actually doing a good building business. The Philadelphia Record and Guide makes this editorial comment:

"Not since 1896—beyond which year the Bureau of Building Inspection is unable to guarantee the accuracy of its figures—has Philadelphia shown a building record for the month of September equal to that of the month just closed. The official figures show for September, 1913, a total expenditure for new buildings of more than $4,000,000. This is, approximately, $1,200,000 more than the total for September a year ago and is considerably in excess of the total for any September since 1896.

"The nearest approach to last month's figures was in September, 1910, when the total reached $3,283,918.

Up to and including Aug. 31 the total for the current year was $28,304,045, while in the corresponding period of 1912 it was $26,251,940.

"Philadelphia thus easily maintains its position as one of the leading building centres in the United States, showing consistent and steady gains at a time when many of the principal cities throughout the country are lagging behind and recording material losses."

Commission Form of Government.

In Yonkers a committee of eighteen citizens has been appointed by Mayor Lennon to investigate the commission form of government, with the possibility of recommending the adoption of such an administration in that city.

BROOKLYN BLOCK FRONT IMPROVEMENT

YONKERS LANDMARK GONE.

Lawrence Homestead Torn Down for Big Estate Development.

One of the interesting landmarks in South Yonkers, the old Lawrence mansion, on Riverdale Avenue and Valentine Lane in South Yonkers, is being torn down by a gang of wreckers, and the passing of this famous home marks an interesting phase of real estate evolution. Years ago it was the country home of the Lawrence family. Several years ago the heirs of the Lawrence estate planned an extensive development of the property. Paved streets, with all city improvements, were laid out.

The American Real Estate Company recently announced the purchase of this property and will soon put it on the market for sale. The southerly half will be restricted to private houses and the northerly half will be devoted to apartments and two-family houses.

The property may be reached by three routes of rapid transit, including the main line electric trains of the New York Central to Ludlow Station, four blocks from the property, and the Sixth and Ninth Avenue elevated trains in connection with the Putnam Division of the New York Central to Lowerre Station, and the Broadway Subway to Van Cortlandt Park, with trolley to Valentine Lane.

New City of Bungalows.

Two hundred bungalows have already been erected on the site of Tent City, below Seaside, at Rockaway Beach, and before next Summer two hundred more will be built, making a new city of bungalows on what was formerly a city of tents. The property has been graded and streets and sidewalks have been built, and sewers, water, and gas mains and other improvements have been installed.

FIRE PREVENTION.

How You Can Help—Warning by Tenement House Department.

Commissioner John J. Murphy of the Tenement House Department has issued the following warning to tenants:

"Remove all incumbrances from fire escapes; clear all hatchways."

"Remove rubbish from cellars, shafts, stair wells, and yards."

"Put drop ladders in their proper places and keep them there."

"Clear fire passages and exits."

"Don't keep matches where children can reach them, and, particularly, don't kindle fires with gasoline or kerosene."

"Every person should make himself acquainted with the means of fire escape with which his residence is provided."

"Don't wait until fire breaks out; do it now."

"A little useful forethought may save much useless grief."

Zone System at Minneapolis.

Minneapolis is the first American city to try the system of "districting" which is not uncommon in Europe, particularly in Germany. A law enacted by the Legislature of Minnesota at its last session permits cities with a population in excess of 50,000 to establish exclusive districts.

When petitioned by 50 per cent. of the property owners in a neighborhood, a City Council may, by a two-thirds vote, designate such neighborhood, either as a residential or as an industrial district. The City Council of Minneapolis on Feb. 28 passed its first resolution under this act, and has now designated several districts, which, however, comprise only a small part of the city.

GREAT DESTRUCTION IN OLD GREENWICH

Forty Ancient Dwellings on Varick Street Torn Out for Wider Thoroughfare.

FIVE BLOCK FRONTS GONE

Preliminary to Seventh Avenue Extension and Subway—Good Price for Old Material.

Greenwich Village is undergoing the greatest era of destruction that has, perhaps, ever been seen in that interesting section of New York. It might be more correct to say improvement, for as a result of this destruction, Seventh Avenue will be extended southward from Eleventh Street to Carmine Street, and Varick Street from that point south to Franklin Street and West Broadway will be widened into a 100 foot thoroughfare by clipping off 35 feet on its easterly side. The road improvement also carries with it the construction of the Seventh Avenue Subway, which will follow the line of Varick Street, and the extended Seventh Avenue northward to Fifty-ninth Street. The contracts have already been let for the southern part of this new subway.

In preparation for these improvements, which will virtually make a new Greenwich Village, the work of destruction is now well under way. Five block fronts on the east side of Varick Street are in the wreckers' hands, and within the last week over forty typical old-fashioned dwellings of the two-story and attic variety, with the little dormer windows jutting out from the attic, have been demolished. These five blocks include all that part of Varick Street from Houston south of Dominick Street.

The Finance Department will accept bids this week for the row of houses on the blocks below Dominick to Canal Street, and soon after the first of the year bids will be received for the demolition of the Varick Street front south of Canal Street. In this latter section is the historic St. John's Chapel, which will have all of its front cut off. No action has yet been taken by the Vestry of Trinity Church as to whether any effort will be made to preserve the old structure or not, and it was stated yesterday that no decision is likely to be made until after Jan. 1.

For the five blocks which have now been practically divested of old shacks the city received the sum of $2,185 for the old material. For the two block fronts from Houston to Charlton Street, containing eighteen ancient residences, $1,310 was paid for the privilege of taking the material. For the two blocks from Charlton to Spring, the sum of $675 was obtained, and $200 was paid for the material in the block front from Spring to Dominick Street. In addition to clearing the land, the house-wreckers are also obliged to cut off and stop up all sewer and water connections, which means that the street in front of each house must be opened back to the water main.

There is apparently little of real value in these old Greenwich structures, and the prices obtained by the city are considered very good. Some idea may be had of the value of old building material from the fact that the first bid received for the two block fronts from Houston to Charlton Street was but $382, and this the Finance Department threw out and called for new bids, with the result that $1,310 was then obtained.

The old Spring Street Presbyterian Church, one of the historic landmarks of the locality, just escaped demolition. The church building will hereafter be on the southeast corner of Spring and Varick Streets, as everything west of the church to the present Varick Street curb line has been torn out.

Trinity Corporation owned most of the property which is now being prepared for the street widening, including the entire two blocks from Charlton to Houston and the greater part of the blocks from Charlton south to Spring Street. Most of the structures are from fifty to seventy-five years old and nearly all are of the more modest type of early city homes. In front of the more imposing four-story building at 182 Varick Street just below Spring are still to be seen a pair of the old-fashioned pineapple ornaments surmounting the iron stoop posts which were so plentiful half a century ago.

The work of cutting through the blocks in the district from Carmine to Eleventh Street will not begin until the completion of the Varick Street widening. It will be the greater part of the work and is expected to be under way soon after Feb. 1. The city has already taken title to all the land required, and the awards are now being fixed by the commission. The most interesting landmark in this locality to go will be the old Bedford Street Methodist Church, which is over 100 years old. The final services will be held there to-day and a consolidation has been effected with the Metropolitan Temple at Seventh Avenue and Fourteenth Street.

LIBERTY STREET IN 1749.

Quaint Advertisement of Dwelling and Bakehouse for Sale.

The following quaint advertisement from The New York Post Boy of January, 1749, gives some indication of the condition of Liberty Street, west of Broadway, at that time. Liberty Street was then known as Crown Street.

"To be Sold, a good Dwelling House and Lot of Ground lying on the North Side of Crown Street, about half Way between the Swego Market and North River, in this City. The House is about 25 Foot front, and 32 Foot back, with a Cellar under it, and a good Kitchen adjoining. Also a Bake house with a good Oven in it, on the same Lot; and a Cart may come into the Yard to the Door of the Bake house. The whole lot is 110 Feet long. Any Person inclining to purchase, may apply to Samuel Brower, living on the Premises, and agree on reasonable Terms.

FEATURES OF CITY AND SUBURBAN REAL ESTATE

THE LIMITATION OF BUILDING HEIGHTS

Forthcoming Report of Mayor's Commission Likely to Stir Up Much Discussion.

FIXING THE ECONOMIC LIMIT

William C. Hazlett Takes Exception to Statements Made by Edward M. Bassett of the Advisory Board.

That there is likely to be a very lively discussion among architects, as well as property owners and builders, over the forthcoming report of the Heights of Buildings Commission is foreshadowed in the following interview with William C. Hazlett, a prominent architect of this city, who takes exception to several statements made by Edward M. Bassett, Chairman of the Advisory Committee of the commission.

Mr. Hazlett said: In an article published in the Real Estate Section of THE NEW YORK TIMES Sunday, Nov. 16, under the heading "Skyscrapers Hurt Real Estate Values," Mr. Bassett is quoted as saying, among other things:

> Some say that the whole question (that of limiting the height of buildings) in lower Manhattan should be left to the working of natural laws. They say with much truth that there is an economic limit of height for buildings, and if owners transcend it they get hurt. It is well known that the cost of construction per cubic foot becomes much higher as additional stories are added; also that more space must be set aside for elevators. A modern office building that does not give quick elevator service is doomed from the start.
>
> To give quick service groups of elevators must run express to a certain height. All of this requires additional space, and an office building that is a mere shell of offices around a great elevator system cannot produce a fair return. It is a popular fallacy that office buildings pay in proportion to their height. The reverse would be quite as near the truth. * *

The whole article, by the way, if not an abstract of the forthcoming report of the committee of which Mr. Bassett is Chairman, appears to be a near relation, and as such should foreshadow that report.

While I do not desire to enter into any discussion as to the advisability or non-advisability of limiting the height of office buildings, nor do I advance any reasons why it should or should not be done—certainly not until after the report has been made and its recommendations fully understood—there are certain statements in the portion quoted which are academic and inconsequential, certain statements which deserve explanation, and certain statements which are misleading.

It is well that the explanations be given, the misleading portions made clear, and the unimportant eliminated before they become ingrained in the results of the report.

It is true, as Mr. Bassett says, that there is an economic limit of height to office buildings. It is not true, however, that the economic limit can be fixed by any kind of regulation or legislation. (You will please note that I emphasize the conjoined words "economic limit.") It is a matter which fixes itself from the conditions, and which may, and probably will, vary in each case as the conditions vary.

The economic height of these buildings is not—or should not be—fixed in any arbitrary manner. It should be, on the contrary, a well-determined ratio to the number of elevators that economically may be installed for the service of all floors above the first; the number of elevators being fixed, in turn, by the area that economically can be set aside for them. In other words, economy may not be met if one says: "This building will be so many stories high." One should say, properly, "How high, with economy, can this building be?"

This question is answered in some such manner: The best practice prefers a large number of small cars—elevator cars—to a smaller number of larger cars. What may be called a small car has a platform area of about 30 square feet, and holds, not exceeding fifteen persons. The area occupied by this car, its shaft, and the inclosing partitions, is approximately 50 square feet.

With cars of this capacity, with speed and "runs" as is usual and customary, the same best practice allows each car to serve about 15,000 square feet of office space—net rental area. Multiplying, then, the number of cars by 15,000 and dividing the product by the net rental area in each story the quotient will be the number of stories than can be served. This can readily, if desired, be formulated.

This is the broad and general rule for determining economic height, subject, of course, to modification in the special case and the special condition.

The most important factor of this formula is, of course, the answer to the question: How many cars may be installed with economy? This answer lies within the mental equipment of the architect.

It is plain, of course, that he should relegate his elevator service to the otherwise unlettable portions of his building; those which, from want of light—natural light—or other reasons, are not available as satisfactory rental area. If he accomplish this with skill and an eye single to economy of space, we have the first—the main—factor in the production of an economically successful building—a factor, sine qua non, an absolute determinate of economic height.

Let us consider for a moment a concrete case. Let us assume a plot of 100 by 200 feet, containing therefore 20,000 square feet. Let it be a postulate that the net rental area of each floor above the first is 65 per cent. of the area of plot, or 13,000 square feet, and that skillful planning will allow thirty elevators to be installed. How high should this building be?

An application of our rule gives, at once, the answer: From 34 to 35—say 34. Is there any legislation that can alter that? Can civic regulation change that quotient? It must be borne in mind that I am considering no question but the economic height of this building—economic alone in relation to the building itself. There is no consideration of the rights, the privileges, the desires of others; no consideration of the want of what I may call, potential tenantry.

This determines only the economic height of this particular building with respect to its plot, and the use of otherwise unrentable areas. It is self-evident that a different plot and different conditions may produce a different result. My main point is, I think, established: That civic regulation cannot determine economic height, whatever else it may do.

An inspection of the result of our inquiry into the concrete case shows the latter portion of Mr. Bassett's phrase—"and if owners transcend it they get hurt"—to be correct. If the owner, in our concrete case, builds to less than 34 stories, he has hurt himself by not obtaining the potential rental area to which his means of transportation entitled him; if more, his transportation is inadequate.

He must alter one or the other. He can, with economy, without losing rental area, install thirty elevators; a less or a greater number spells loss, somewhere. He is upon the horns of a dilemma!

Proper elevator service—which, by the way, is the key to the success of any building requiring it—may be better understood by those unfamiliar with its problems if likened to a railway running vertically. The methods governing successful cara of traffic, while not the same, are similar.

Perfect elevator service requires that the time consumed in carrying any passenger from the ground to the appointed floor shall be, in each case, the same. This result is hardly possible in practice, though an approximation to it may be obtained. It is to this end that service is divided into "express" and "local."

The disposition of these, the "run" of each, the number of each, is matter of detail of service, and alters, in but some degree, the total number of cars. This, in turn, determines economic height; any other method is arbitrary, empiric, and without reason.

To say, as Mr. Bassett does, "an office building that is a mere shell of offices around a great elevator system cannot produce a fair return," seems academic. Of course it cannot. One can conceive a building so high as to be all elevator shaft, but one would hardly build it unless in pleasantry. Our investigation of the determining factor of height shows that one should set aside for elevator service only such space as is otherwise unrentable.

How this should be done, how to escape the Scylla of overtransportation without being destroyed by the Charybdis of loss of rental is, as has been said, within the mental equipment of the architect. It is not an insoluble problem!

To stigmatize as fallacious the proposition that office buildings pay in proportion to their height is misleading.

It is true of some office buildings, and might be true of these were they but half as high. Given, however, potential tenantry, given a plan of skill, given a well-determined height, (we have seen how that should be done,) given normal conditions of light and air; the contrary is nearer the truth. In other words, the higher one can build—the conditions of building being well determined—the greater the return upon the investment.

It is not essential to give reasons for this; they are many, variable, and complicated, but the truth of the statement is demonstrable. The determination of the general scheme of a great office building, involving, as it may, an expenditure of millions, is not child's play, nor is it to be undertaken with uncertainty and hesitation, but to be approached with an eye single to its success as a "business proposition." Mere height, other things not well considered, has no part in this.

Parenthetically, it may be said, due reflection upon these statements will give causes for the lack of commensurate return from certain buildings. The fault was not with the proposition, but with its method of carrying out.

There is one other statement of Mr. Bassett's that misleads: "The cost of construction per cubic foot becomes much higher as additional stories are added—"

That is true, subject, however, to qualifications of the word much. How much? It is almost negligible. If the cubic foot cost of a thirty-story building is found to be 40 cents—it should not exceed this—how much a cubic foot should ten added stories cost? After reflection it will be found that the only item of moment that adds to the cubic foot cost is that of the time consumed in getting men and material to the added height.

Inasmuch as the time of workmen, under union rules, begins when they start to go to their work, and as the time consumed in hoisting material to the mean height of the additional stories is an item of loss; a sum commensurate with the time consumed in this travel should be added. But this is small—quite small—1 per cent. should cover it. If loss of time due to inclement weather is considered, it is well to remember that no more rain falls upon a high building than upon a low, and that cold is equally severe. If high wind is a factor, the work upon one high building was delayed just one-half day in six months from this cause.

If Mr. Bassett had it in mind to compare the cost of a twenty-story building with one of, say, thirty stories he is equally misleading. While the proportionate cost of some items of the work—steel and brickwork, for example—may be greater, the proportionate cost of others is reduced. The total remains about the same.

Mr. Bassett's committee was, I believe, asked to report to the Board of Estimate upon the advisability of limiting the height of buildings. What the portion quoted has to do with that question I fail to see. How the matters therein touched upon concern the Board of Estimate or the public I cannot comprehend.

Whether high buildings pay or not, whether they cost more or less, appears to be inconsequential.

There is no doubt that limiting the height of buildings will greatly reduce the potential value of the ground to the owners thereof. Whether the public will receive commensurate benefit is another matter.

BIG TRAFFIC INCREASE.

A Gain of 375 Per Cent. Shown on New Westchester Line.

The New York, Westchester & Boston Railway Company began operation of passenger train service May 29, 1912. At the end of the first day an examination of the tickets showed that 1,815 passengers had been carried by the new line. During the first ten days of November, 1913, the average daily number of passengers carried was 8,604, an increase of 6,789 per day, or about 375 per cent., in a period of eighteen months of operation.

Considering the fact that the Westchester is at present operating through a sparsely settled section, aside from the cities of Mount Vernon and New Rochelle and the town of White Plains, and that in these three instances stations are situated at some distance from the business centres, the showing is remarkable.

At present the company is greatly handicapped by unsatisfactory terminal facilities at the New York end, but extensive improvements affecting these terminals are now in sight. Awards for building the connection between the Bronx Park line of the present Subway and the 180th Street station of the Westchester will be given out within a few weeks, and, work once begun, it will be a matter of months only before passengers from the Westchester can change at 180th Street, under cover, to the frequent Subway service for the west side of Manhattan or the business section at Forty-second Street and south.

At Harlem River the shuttle train service between the Westchester station and 129th Street is far from convenient, but with the third-tracking of the Second and Third Avenue lines, which will afford express train service to and from Chatham Square, the situation will be greatly improved.

Plans for this work are part of the dual system of rapid transit worked out by the Public Service Commission for the First District, State of New York, and recently accepted by the city and the Interboro Rapid Transit Company.

Of greatest importance, however, so far as Westchester County is concerned, will be the completion of the Southern Boulevard and Westchester Avenue extension of the Lexington Avenue Subway. Between the New York, Westchester & Boston Railway and this line there will be a connection in the vicinity of Hunts Point Station, and express trains on the Lexington Avenue line will make the run from Hunts Point Road to Grand Central Terminal with but two stops, namely, 125th Street and 86th Street.

At Grand Central passengers can connect with the present Subway line, the new Seventh Avenue Subway, the Steinway Tube and other connecting city lines. It is evident, therefore, that residents of Westchester County east of the Bronx River was deeply interested in the completion, at the earliest date possible, of this new line of transportation in Manhattan.

Signs are in evidence of a genuine real estate movement in Westchester County during the Spring of 1914, and once started there is little doubt that building operations on a large scale will continue in this section during the next decade.

Municipal Building Award.

Report of the Commissioners to acquire title to the property at Court and Joralemon Streets, Brooklyn, as the site for the new Municipal Building, was confirmed last week by Supreme Court Justice Maddox. The report calls for an award of $258,000.

PERPLEXITIES OF THE INCOME TAX

How Method of Collecting at the Source Affects Real Estate Owners and Agents.

SUGGEST CHANGES IN ACT

Walter Lindner Explains Need for Modifications—Points Out Causes of Friction.

Some of the perplexities of the income tax provisions which real estate owners and brokers are endeavoring to understand were discussed and explained last week by Walter Lindner, solicitor for the Title Guarantee and Trust Company, before the members of the Real Estate Board of New York, at their first monthly luncheon. The method of collecting tax from this source is the point which seems the most troublesome. In explaining what "source" means in the Income Tax law, Mr. Lindner stated that it might mean the original payer or any conduit of payment at the various stages of the course of a payment from the original debtor to the final creditor.

"If we follow an item of rent from the original tenant until it reaches the owner of the land," he said, "we may see at what various places a source may be found. For instance, if a tenant owes rent, he would be the original source of the payment, as we usually understand that word. If the tenant does not pay a rent so large that he is directed by the act to retain it, then he need not deduct anything for income tax from his landlord—that is to say, if you have a tenant who pays you less than $3,000 a year, whether he pays you directly or through an agent, the tenant does not have to deduct as a source of payment.

"But if that item of rent, instead of being paid by the tenant directly to his landlord, is paid to an agent who has charge of the management of the building, and if then that agent, collecting from various tenants, even if they occupy other buildings, receives and is required to transmit to his principal a sum which aggregates from the various sources from which the agent derives it a sum in excess of $3,000 during the tax year, then, although the tenant was not a source who was required to make a retention, the agent, however, becomes a source with regard to his principal, and he is required by the language of the act to retain on behalf of his principal and to pay into the Government the amount of the tax. That is one way in which we may be affected.

"To follow the agency business a little further, when an agent is required to transmit to his principal a sum in excess of $3,000 the question as to whether it means net or gross income has arisen. As I read the act, it means gross income.

"If your rent roll is over $3,000 on behalf of any particular client, and if out of that rent roll you are instructed to pay the interest on his mortgage, the taxes on his property, and repairs, then, notwithstanding the fact that you may send him less than $3,000 net, still, as I read the act, those deductions are not to be allowed at the time when you are forwarding your monthly statement. You have to take out the 1 per cent. on the gross rent roll and hold it until the end of the year.

"Suppose your agent is handling $6,000 of rent belonging to you and he gets in $6,000 during the tax year in gross rent, and, if married, you serve him with a certificate that $4,000 out of that rent is exempt. If he did not have the certificate he would hold up $60. When you have served him with a certificate he cannot hold up more than $20, which he holds until the end of the year. Then comes the question whether or not you owe that $20 to the Government and then you are entitled to figure your deductions, and if out of your $6,000 of rent you have paid $3,000 of interest on your mortgage and $500 of taxes on your property, you will see that $3,500 deducted from your $6,000 of rent leaves only $2,500 of total net income after deduction, and then, if that $2,500 should be the only income of the person under consideration, he is not liable to any tax and the agent ought to return the $20, provided that you go through the complicated machinery of making an entire return of all your business affairs to your agent. If you do not want to do that, it is the duty of the agent to pay the $20 to the Collector of Internal Revenue. If by reason of deductions you think you ought to get that $20, you will have to apply for a refund to the Collector of Internal Revenue in your district—and you may get the money back some time.

"With regard to the mortgage interest that one pays or receives he will find that there are many ruts in the road by which the mortgage interest must travel from the owner of the equity to the final holder, especially if the money should be collected through an agency, such as a corporation which guarantees payment. There you will find that holders of mortgages expect their interest to come to them promptly and without deduction. Holders of such mortgages will frequently receive their interest short of the gross amount, with a 1 per cent. deduction here and there.

"When a corporation pays interest, either upon coupons or by way of registered interest, the corporation is required to hold out the tax as against an individual, even though the amount which it pays to an individual is less than the amount of exempt income.

"In concluding, it seems pertinent to ask whether this principle of retention at the source, which is going to become more troublesome, is worth while, or whether as business men we ought to consider whether a movement should be started toward an attempt to get Congress to modify tha act. It is hardly proper to make A the collector for B and put A under pains and penalties if he does not properly read his complicated law correctly, although all he gets is his commission for collection.

"It seems to me that a body as influential as this could start not only for this city, but for the country, an agitation toward such a modification which will make the law all that the Government needs and may indeed help the Government, because the act will become unpopular.

"The intent evidently was to impose no harassment upon persons with an income below $3,000 or $4,000, but with this business of retention at the source, with this business of holding collected money from coupons, with this business of interrogating every real estate agent, every mortgage collector, every trustee, you will find that there will be such harassment, a feeling that this thing is not working right."

COMMERCIAL LEASES.

Attempt to Check Uptown Movement by Remodeling Old Lofts.

Many of the more important loft leases recorded last week show that the northward movement of trade still continues. A well-known broker, discussing the situation last week, said: "While the uptown movement still continues, it has been checked to some extent by the fact that owners of the old-fashioned loft buildings downtown have begun to realize that the only way to rent their property and keep it rented is to remodel it and bring it up to date.

"If this had been done a couple of years ago the exodus would have been stopped. The majority of the lofts in the old silk and woolen districts adjacent to Broadway have been allowed to run down for years, with the result that as soon as the tenant's lease expires he looks for modern quarters and usually finds them further uptown in the Fourth Avenue or midtown loft zones at a very little advance, and in some instances for less money, so great are the inducements that have been offered to bring old firms uptown for the purpose of creating new business centres."

In the midtown section Frederick Fox & Co. have leased for the Times Square Improvement Company the tenth floor, containing over 20,000 square feet of space, in the building now being erected at the northeast corner of Broadway and Thirty-seventh Street. The lessees are Reisman, Rothman & Bieber, large manufacturers of children's coats, now located at University Place and Twelfth Street. The lease is for a long term of years at an aggregate rental of about $70,000. The entire set of eleven lofts and part of the store in this building are now rented.

The Gaines & Drennan Company has leased for the Tingue Brown Company the sixth loft in 118-120 East Twenty-fifth Street to Lion & Co., dealers in ribbons and silks, now located at 213 Fourth Avenue; also the first loft in the Hartley Building, 377 Fourth Avenue, to Stern & Pohly, silk manufacturers, now at 67 Greene Street.

M. and L. Hess have leased, in conjunction with Corn & Co., the seventh, eighth, and ninth lofts in the McMorrow Building at 131-137 West Thirty-fifth Street, size 75 by 100, to J. Dryfoos, Son & Co., and the Idella Manufacturing Company of 31-33 West Twenty-third Street, where the present lessees have been located for a long term of years.

The new homes of the above firms are located just west of the Herald Square Theatre. The lease is for a term of five years at an aggregate rental of $67,500.

Corn & Co. have leased for N. Brigham Hall and William D. Bloodgood, as agents for the Fourth Avenue and Thirty-second Street Company, the entire seventh floor, containing 10,000 square feet, in the building 470-478 Fourth Avenue, southwest corner of Fourth Avenue and Thirty-second Street, for a long term of years to Rosen, Piechner & Lipschutz, manufacturers' agents and importers of velvets, velveteens, and corduroys, located at 32 West Twenty-second Street.

George R. Read & Co. have leased for C. Hofferberth 9,500 square feet in the building 531-537 West Twenty-first Street to the National Company; for the Canal Realty Company, 5,000 square feet in the building 533-537 Canal Street to the Adder Company; for J. Hull Browning, the top floor in the building 73 Warren Street to Henry Bessey; for William C. Walker Sons, the second floor in the building 38 Murray Street to the White Paper Box Company; the corner store in the building 68 Broad Street to David Ostrove, and the store adjoining the corner in the same building to Spyropoulis & Adams.

Frederick Southack & Alwyn Ball, Jr., have leased 22,000 square feet in the building 352 Fourth Avenue to Messrs. Rosenfield & Robinson for a term of years.

The Cross & Brown Company has leased for the New York Telephone Company to the Paris Importing and Manufacturing Company the entire tenth floor at 28-30 West Thirty-eighth Street, and for Charles A. Gould to Isaac Silverman space on the ninth floor at 126 Fifth Avenue.

N. Brigham Hall and William D. Bloodgood have leased for the estate of Josephine Macdonald the eleventh floor in 718-720 Broadway to Max I. Aronson & Co. for a term of years.

QUEENSBORO BRIDGE PLAZA.

Queens Chamber of Commerce Wants City to Acquire Entire Block.

The Chamber of Commerce of the Borough of Queens has adopted resolutions urging the Board of Estimate to appropriate money requested by Bridge Commissioner O'Keeffe for the reconstruction work on Queensboro Bridge to prepare it for operation of the trains of the dual subway system, and for the relocation of the present trolley terminal at the Manhattan end of the bridge.

The amount necessary for the change in the bridge for operation of rapid trains is approximately $2,500,000, and covers the cost of an approach to the main passenger station on the plaza, Long Island City, and changing the floor girders in the bridge for the operation of the ten-car subway trains of the Broadway-Fifty-ninth Street line, which will be operated on the inside set of tracks now used by the New York & Queens trolleys, and for connecting the Second Avenue elevated railroad in Manhattan with the upper set of tracks on the bridge.

The construction of the Broadway-Fifty-ninth Street subway will necessitate the relocation of the present trolley terminal at the Manhattan end of the bridge, and Commissioner O'Keeffe has submitted five alternative plans for this change.

The first plan, approved by the Bridge Department and by the engineers of the Borough of Queens, would take the entire block between Fifty-ninth and Sixtieth Streets, Second and Third Avenues. The cost of acquiring this block is estimated at $3,000,000. The second plan would only take one-half of the block nearest Third Avenue, and the cost is estimated at $1,700,000. The three other alternative plans submitted are for loop service around First Avenue.

The first plan submitted by Commissioner O'Keeffe would provide a plaza at the Manhattan end of the bridge, and would place the present trolley terminal ons block to the west, or at Third Avenue.

A special committee of the Chamber, W. H. Williams, Chairman, was appointed to appear before the Board of Estimate this week and urge the adoption of the plan to take the entire block.

GOVERNOR GLYNN FAVORS TAX REFORM

Present Methods of Collection Declared to be Obsolete and Very Costly.

MANY DIFFERENT TAXES

Undervaluation and Inequality in Assessment of Real Estate Said to Exist Throughout State.

In what is termed "An Official Survey of the State," Gov. Glynn is reported as voicing his opinions on questions of public policy which he considers to have the most serious claim upon his attention. Among these very important public affairs there is none that more vitally concerns property owners than the condition of the State's finances.

Under this department, the Governor specifically calls attention to the need of reform in two instances. First, the problem of taxation and the readjustment of the revenue system, so that it may rest upon modern methods and meet our modern necessities.

He says "the methods of collection are obsolete and costly, and I may draw attention to the fact that in some towns an owner of real property has to pay State, county, town, and village taxes, school, fire, dog, garbage, highway, lighting, sewer, sidewalk, water supply, and poll taxes, and that these taxes are payable to different persons in different places, at great inconvenience to the public and at great cost to the State for collection.

"In my judgment the property owner is usually quite willing to pay his taxes, and the least the State can do for him is to arrange that all his taxes shall be payable to one official."

Second: Too Many Tax Exemptions.—"Taking the State as a whole, there is much undervaluation and much inequality in the assessment of real property with an ever-extending list of exemptions.

"The exemption list in the State is too large. The assessed valuation of real and personal property in the State in 1912 was more than $11,000,000,000, and more than $2,000,000,000 of this sum, or nearly 20 per cent. was exempted from taxation.

"Our entire list of exemptions should be revised. At the present time exemptions are found scattered through the general laws, in city charters and in the private charters of corporations. All exemptions should be included in one act, the tax law, and its terms in that respect should be made more stringent, so that there should be no elasticity in taking property out of the taxable class."

Sale of Ex-Mayor Strong's House.

Twenty-one years ago former Mayor Strong lived at 25 West Thirtieth Street. Mayor McClellan and many other notable people lived in the section. Then there began the encroachment of the business world, that has changed the appearance of so many other streets in restless New York. The sedate residential streets, occupied by three and four-story private dwellings, were changed gradually by the conversion of the houses into store properties by changes in the basement and first floor, and the richer residential element began to make way for their less plutocratic but more pushing neighbors.

These changes have made this section a hustling community, and real estate values have advanced with the increase of population. No. 25 West Thirtieth Street will be sold at public auction by Joseph P. Day Tuesday, Nov. 25, at noon, at the Exchange Salesroom, 14 Vesey Street, for the estate of Elizabeth Papalx, deceased.

Keyport Estate at Auction.

The property of the late Dr. G. G. Hoagland, corner of Front and Main Streets, Keyport, N. J., will be sold at auction next Saturday, Nov. 29, at 3. The property consists of a house of fourteen rooms and a stable. The frontage on Front Street is about 91 feet, with a depth on Main Street of about 196 feet. The property is in the heart of Keyport, sixty minutes from New York, on the Central Railroad of New Jersey, and trolley cars pass the property for Matawan, Keansburg, Red Bank, and Atlantic Highlands.

Harlem Property at Auction.

On Friday, Nov. 28, Bryan L. Kennelly will sell at auction by order of William A. Prendergast, Controller of the City of New York, a vacant plot located on the north side of East 129th Street and 245 feet east of Third Avenue. On Tuesday, Dec. 2, Mr. Kennelly, at foreclosure sale will sell No. 111 West 122d Street, the three-story brown stone dwelling, located 155 feet west of Lenox Avenue, and on Tuesday, Dec. 9th, 310 and 312 West 143d Street near Eighth Avenue, a four-story brick stable.

Local Improvement Boards.

There are twenty-five districts of local improvements in the city, and the Aldermen from each Aldermanic district within such local improvement district, together with the Borough President, constitute the local board of each local improvement district. All resolutions affecting more than one local improvement district, or the borough generally, are required to be adopted at a "joint meeting" of all the local boards of the borough.

A Hungarian Idea.

By a State law of 1913, favoring people who improve real estate, Pittsburgh and Scranton are the first cities in the United States to cut the tax rate on buildings radically lower than the rate on land, following the plan which has attracted so much attention in the cities of Western Canada. It is said that the principle had its origin in Budapest, Hungary, where the plan has been in vogue for many years.

Old Factory Plot at Auction.

The old National Biscuit factory property, comprising the block front on the west side of Montgomery Street, between Water and South Streets, which was the scene of a fire several years ago, will be sold at auction in foreclosure proceedings next Wednesday, in the Vesey Street salesroom, by Joseph P. Day. The plot is 140 by 185.10.

Improvements at Park Hill.

The American Real Estate Company is completing an attractive addition to its property at Park Hill, Yonkers. Hillcrest Avenue has been extended on the north to connect with Rumsey Boulevard, thus making a short cut to the Dunwoodie Club and, at the same time, opening up an attractive district in Park Hill.

SUGGESTS ROOF GARDENS.

Borough President-Elect Marks's Remedy for Street Congestion.

Borough President-elect Marcus M. Marks of Manhattan, at the annual dinner of the Fifth Avenue Association in the Waldorf-Astoria last week, suggested that owners and lessees of mercantile buildings might fit out the roofs for some of the purposes for which employes now seek the sidewalks.

Roof gardens, economically equipped, would, he said, tend to lessen the street congestion of factory operatives during the noon hour.

Increased Building Costs.

If the building regulations are made stricter, up goes the cost of the house, and when it rises in cost some stratum of the population is debarred from even an attempt at home ownership and all strata are affected. The effect, therefore, of proposed building requirements on the cost of the house, whether as purchase price or as rent, to the expectant inhabitants thereof, is a matter for the serious consideration of those interested in housing. We must carefully weigh the loss to the community through this increased price or rent as against the gain to the community, if any, because of greater solidity of construction or other improvement, if improvement it is, that may be caused by new building regulations.—From an address before the National Housing Conference.

Brooklyn Brokers Elect Officers.

At the annual meeting of the Brooklyn Board of Real Estate Brokers, held last week, C. C. Mollenhauer of the firm of Kelsey, Suydam & Mollenhauer was elected President to succeed De Hart Bergen, and Sigmund Cederstrom was elected Secretary, to succeed Eugene J. Grant. Thomas Hovenden was re-elected Vice President and William H. Smith Treasurer. Five Directors, whose terms had expired, were re-elected. They are Frederick B. Snow, William H. Smith, Sigmund Cederstrom, Stephen F. Barrera, and C. C. Mollenhauer.

YOUR HOME
in the country should combine natural and delightful surroundings with accessibility and a pleasant social environment.
I have several houses that offer these and many other advantages. They are located on plots of varying size, and designed to harmonize with their surroundings. They have every desirable appointment, and were specially planned to insure convenient management. If you will suggest the house you have in mind, I shall be pleased to send information regarding those mentioned above which most nearly conform to your ideas. You will not be interviewed by a representative unless you request it.
PAUL V. SHIELDS
129 Front St., N. Y. C. Phone 4123 John.

Rambling Country House
particularly adapted to its surroundings. The architecture is Old English in style. A beamed living room (16x30) has large open fireplace and looks out over terraced formal garden. The second floor has been laid out to give each bedroom plenty of light and air. The service wing embodies an unusually convenient arrangement. The appointments are first-class throughout. The plot of one acre has been graded and planted, and is within sight of water, with right of way to beach. An ideal country home at fair price and on your own terms. PAUL V. SHIELDS, 129 Front Street. 'Phone 4123 John.

"CHEAP HOUSES"
The people who have taken houses at COVERT PARK say they are cheap. They refer to VALUES, and not to construction.
You can get more for your money at COVERT PARK than in any other suburb of New York. A community has been established just outside the city where the cost of living is low.
To enlarge the community a few more "cheap" houses will be sold to desirable parties. You can buy a house under construction, or large plot, or have your house specially planned without extra expense. CONSTRUCTION GUARANTEED. PRICES LOW, TERMS EASY. F. W. Meysenburg, 200 5th Av.

BUNGALOW COLONY.
The Only One Actually in the Village of Larchmont.
It is located between the water and the station, and is recognized as being the most picturesque in the vicinity; its fine forest trees and rugged, rolling character give it the rustic effect so essential to a proper setting for a bungalow or semi-bungalow.
Come and see the homes of our members who have already built and those which are now under construction.
For $5,000 you can get an artistic home of six or seven rooms and bath on a large plot, small payment down, balance like rent; our booklet will inform you of particulars.

Exclusive Apartments
At Low Rentals

145 East 35th St., situated in the attractive Murray Hill section, in a most accessible neighborhood to the theatres and new business districts, with large rooms especially well planned. Single floor and duplex apartments of 7 large rooms with 1 and 2 baths; rents from $1,500 up.

130 West 57th St., near Carnegie Music Hall, and the 58th Street Elevated Station. Remarkably sunny apartments of 2 and 3 rooms and bath with vacuum cleaning and hotel service in one of the finest co-operative buildings in the City. Also restaurant with home cooking in the building. Especially desirable for single men or women. Also large studio with north light.

116 East 58th St., just east of Park Avenue, a new building which is one of the best finished and best planned houses in the City. Housekeeping apartments of 7, 8 and 9 rooms and 3 baths; living room 16x22, with open fires. Southerly apartments have wonderful amount of sunlight; bathrooms and kitchens are tiled to the ceiling. Rents from $2,000 up. Also 3-room apartment at $1,000. These are the cheapest apartments of their size in the City.

27 East 62nd St., just off Madison Avenue, new fireproof apartments of from 4 to 6 rooms and bath, especially designed for tenants who wish excellent accommodations in New York while keeping their country places open. Rents are exceedingly moderate for a building so well designed and so advantageously located.

11 East 68th St., northwest corner of Madison Avenue. In the Fifth Avenue block and within a few doors of the famous Whitney house, the finest location in the City. Overlooks Central Park. This apartment house, just completed, has very large rooms, ample closet space and exceptional servants' quarters. Apartments from 6 to 13 rooms and from 2 to 4 baths. Rents from $2,000 up. Especially designed for discriminating tenants.

780 Madison Avenue, between 66th and 67th Streets. The best residential neighborhood. Housekeeping and non-housekeeping apartments. Either furnished or unfurnished. The outlook from the westerly windows is across the finest part of upper Fifth Avenue, to Central Park, one block away. 8 and 9 rooms and 3 baths. Every apartment is planned for housekeeping, but all meals will be furnished in apartments, if desired, by house caterer, who is an experienced hotel man formerly with the Waldorf-Astoria, or arrangements may be made with him for special occasions. Privacy of an individual family residence. Each apartment has an entire floor to itself, and every room is an outside room. Rentals $1,800 up.

829 Park Ave., southeast corner of 76th Street, thoroughly modern fireproof apartment of the best type, containing duplex and simplex apartments of 7 and 8 rooms and 2 and 3 baths. Rents from $1,700 up. Every room is an outside room and there are no such apartments on Park Avenue at the price.

In view of the lateness of the season special prices will be made on the remaining vacant apartments until next October. This is a wonderful opportunity which many people who had expected to remain out of town this winter should look into at once.

NOTE TO OWNERS.—If you are not satisfied with the present management or rental of your real estate holdings we will be delighted to look into the matter and advise you what had best be done. We are experts in this business.

A STRIKE'S ASPECT

Copper Country Club Gives Gov. Ferris a Report on Michigan Mines—Miners' Costs.

The Copper Country Commercial Club, an organization of business men in Houghton and Keweenaw Counties, Mich., appointed a committee a few weeks ago to look into conditions surrounding the protracted strike of miners in the Lake Superior district. The reason given for this action was that "a state of affairs has existed, and today exists, in the copper country which is nullifying every effort and every purpose of this organization." A report on the investigation conducted by the committee submitted to Gov. Woodbridge N. Ferris of Michigan recently was introduced by the words quoted above, and the contents of the report showed that the Commercial Club had gone pretty well toward the bottom of the troubles which have tied up in a strike the Michigan mines for a number of weeks.

In dealing with the direct incentive for the walkout of the men last July the report describes efforts of the Western Federation of Miners to get a foothold in the lake region.

"During the time that mining operations have been carried on in this district," it said, "the industry has been singularly free from strike troubles. The entire district has been carried on on the open shop principle, as nearly as the committee has been able to ascertain. At no time has any part of the district been thoroughly unionized, and at no time in the history of the district has any mining company treated directly with any labor organizations. At the same time men have been employed by the various companies without discrimination on account of union affiliations.

"At the present time there are employed by the various mining companies on surface, machinists, moulders, railway engineers, firemen, and others who belong to unions or labor organizations of their particular crafts. Up to the time of the present strike men were not discriminated against because of their membership in the Western Federation of Miners or any other miners' union, and many men undoubtedly were at work in the district, underground, who belonged to the Western Federation of Miners. Since the beginning of the present strike, however, every one of the managers of the mining companies operating in the district has announced that hereafter no member of the Western Federation will be employed, and it may be stated at this point that each of the managers of the various companies has also stated, both to this committee and to representatives of the Federal Department of Labor and the Governor of the State, that they will under no circumstances recognize in any manner that particular organization."

No "Black List" Found.

The committee informed Gov. Ferris that, so far as it could discover, neither the mining companies nor the mine operators had formed any combination before the strike started, but that a uniform policy had been adopted after trouble began in regard to recognition of the union miners and the re-employment of members of the organization. A "black list" was not discovered. On this point the committee found that there had not existed, in recent years at least, any agreement between the companies to refuse employment to employes discharged by another. In fact, it was reported that men let out by one concern have had no difficulty in getting work elsewhere. One instance was found of an employe discharged by a mining Captain in one shaft of a mine having been taken on within a few days at another shaft of the same mine.

The committee pointed out that some grossly misleading reports had come out of the copper country concerning living conditions among the men. The matter was looked into, and this is what was said in the statement:

"It has been the policy of the mining companies operating in Michigan to build whatever houses were necessary upon their own land and to lease or rent the houses to their employes. In no case is an employe compelled to live in a company house—on the contrary, because of the very moderate rents that are charged in the Copper Country, company houses are in such great demand that the mining companies have a great many applications for each house."

Rents and Food Costs.

The statement was supplemented by these figures, showing rents charged at some of the mines:

Mohawk Mining Company, fifty-three single frame houses of five and six rooms and a barn for $5.50 per month; Calumet and Hecla Company, forty log houses of four and five rooms each for figures extending from 50 cents to $3 a month; the Wolverine Copper Company, sixty-five frame houses of from three to seven rooms for $3.50 to $7 a month.

The rents charged at the other mines of the Peninsula were on the same scale as these, with fuel supplied at cost, approximately.

To show the relative cheapness of houses in the Lake region with other mining camps, the committee included in the report renting figures from the Butte district of Montana. At Butte, it was stated, four-room houses cost per month $15 outside of the city limits, and from $17 to $24 a month in the city, as compared with a three-dollar-per-month cost of a house of the same size in Michigan. Six-room dwellings at the Montana mines were said to rent around $28 a month, against $5 a month in the Lake copper country.

An elaborate table of food prices was contained in the report with comparisons, also, with quotations at Butte. It showed that the average excess of cost for the common necessities of life at Butte over Houghton was about 25 per cent. Expressed in concrete fashion, a grocery and meat bill of $35 at Houghton would have been $43.75 at Butte.

After showing that the mining companies had spent several hundred thousand dollars for schools, public baths, and libraries, and had made efforts to care for the health of the men and to protect them from accident, the committee touched upon the demands of the strikers. They asked for recognition of the Western Federation of Miners, for either the abolishment of the one-man drill or the working of two men on each drill, for a minimum wage of $3 for trammers and $3.50 for miners, and for an eight-hour day. In regard to recognition of the union, the committee said:

"Whether the mine managers are justified in the stand they have taken relative to recognition of this organization is one which must be left to public opinion. The fact remains, and the committee is thoroughly convinced of this, that the mine managers of the copper country district of Michigan will not recognize the Western Federation of Miners, and therefore any further discussion of that subject would be useless."

The One-Man Drill.

From its investigation the committee concluded that the one-man drill in this district was an economic necessity, and that the companies would insist on its operation. The drill, the report said, had brought with it a decided increase of efficiency, which, with further experience, would result not only in lower costs, but also in higher wages to the men. At present an operator of a one-man machine gets $3.34 per shift, against $2.83 each to the operators of the two-man drill. The committee found that a minimum wage scale would work harm to both miner and mine operator. Several of the companies now operating would have to go out of business if the wage demanded by the union went into operation, and throw a great number of men out of employment. On the other hand, a uniform scale of pay doing away with the prevailing contract system among the miners and trammers, would work hardship upon a portion of the mining force now earning wage in excess of the scale proposed by the Western Federation.

The problem of putting the mines on a straight eight-hour shift, the committee found, would probably be the most difficult contention of all to settle. Owing to the varying depths of the mines, some going down to record low levels for copper mines the world over, it was stated that so much time was required in lowering and raising the underground workers that stable hours could not be maintained. The committee was informed by the mine operators, however, that the companies were considering previous to the strike the establishment of an eight-hour day, in as far as it could be put into force.

A LULL IN STEEL

Pig Iron Drops Again—More Furnaces Close—Crude Steel Production Curtailed.

Special to The New-York Times.

PITTSBURGH, Penn., Nov. 22.—Pig iron has shown a further declining tendency in the West since the opening of the month. Restriction of output has become marked in the districts west of the Alleghanies. Furnace interests had expected that consumers would begin reinforcing their stocks by the middle of this month, but the absolute lack of inquiry has discouraged sellers. The list of active merchant furnaces in the Valleys district has dropped to eight out of seventeen, and the output for Western Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois in pig iron for November will drop below the low point for three years.

Sales of negligible tonnages of Bessemer iron for prompt shipment reveal a tendency to shade the former low point of $15.25 at Valley furnace, or $16.15 delivered Pittsburgh. Basic iron is quoted frankly at less than $13.25 Valley furnace, the former minimum. Demand in the East and the South for forge grades has prevented low-grade iron from dropping appreciably.

Restriction of production has begun in crude steel. Though the week saw a very quiet market, there were no further price declines, the minimum of $29.50 for Bessemer or open-hearth billets practically marking low limit of the market at this time. In finished steel shipments have dropped 33 per cent. since Oct. 15. Two independent steel interests in Pittsburgh district made reductions of upward of 25 per cent. in their working forces this week. The Steel Corporation plants in Western Pennsylvania and Eastern Ohio are endeavoring to keep above 70 per cent. of operating capacity, but a further reduction of operations by Dec. 1 is being considered by the corporation.

Bars, plates, and shapes are quoted on the basis of 1.30c, Pittsburgh mill, which has been the official minimum ever since the opening of the month. There have been known sales of both plates and bars at 1.25c mill in the past ten days, however.

Foreign steel really is cutting little figure in the domestic market at this juncture. Producers hear little of offers of imported steel even at Atlantic seaboard markets. The main factor in the market is the hesitancy of consumers to buy for any but present needs until prices shape up at the opening of the year.

Specifying on bars and shapes on running contracts has slowed down since the opening of the month. In some circles this lull in specifying on contracts is interpreted to mean that consumers are holding off in the hope that contracts will be revised downward. There has been a decided falling off in shipments into railroad consumption since Nov. 1. Bar iron is weak, especially in Chicago and some Eastern centres.

There are admissions that the minimum of 2c on black sheets has been shaded recently at least to 1.95c. Sheets have weakened throughout the West, and the falling off in shipments in this line has been one of the overshadowing features of the steel market. Sales have been made during the week on the basis of 1.95c for 28-gauge black sheets, which is the low point in two years. Tin plate is in a better position, although there has been an admitted falling off in shipments. Sheet and tin plate plants of the Steel Corporation have been running on a three and four-day schedule in Pittsburgh territory during the week.

Connellsville reports a continued restriction in coke output, although there has been no further price decline, the minimum for furnace coke for this year's shipment being $1.90 at oven. Some operators are quoting $2 on first quarter furnace coke.
